

CENTRAL EUROPEAN UNIVERSITY
PHILOSOPHY DEPARTMENT

POLITICAL-CRITICAL ART AND THE AESTHETIC

By

Maria-Alina Asavei

In partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in Philosophy

Supervisor: Professor David Weberman

Budapest, Hungary

2013

I thereby declare that this dissertation contains no material accepted for any other degrees in other institutions and not materials previously written and/or published by another person unless otherwise noticed

Budapest, August, 2013

Maria-Alina Asavei

ABSTRACT

Whether art should be “aesthetic” or “political” is not a new question. Therefore, the answer is not definite and the debate is still going on. The dissertation attempts to answer this question, and it claims that politically engaged art practice does not signify “the end of art” or “the end of aesthetics” (as often assumed), but only the end of a certain, narrow understanding of the aesthetic.

In many critical studies, aesthetics has become the main enemy of socially and politically engaged art. For instance, the theoretical discourses around the 7th Berlin Biennale of Contemporary Art entitled “Forget Fear,” 2012 (where Voina art collective was one of the associate curators) emphasized the aesthetic (and the aesthetic object) as one of the enemies of political art (the other “enemies” are: the curator, the art market, the neo-liberal elites and the individualist art production as opposed to the collectivist art production).

In other words, there appears to be a gap between aesthetic and political art. Some art theorists, critics, and aestheticians hold that political art is not “proper art” because the co-existence of politics and art undermines the aesthetic dimension of art. Political art deals with problems of justice or abuses of power, necessarily implying a certain degree of knowledge of the context and awareness from the viewer’s side, while the aesthetic has to do with an autonomous and pleasurable experience of a special kind, which happens to us when we perceive the form of art works and other natural kinds.

This dissertation claims that there is no dichotomy between “political art” and “aesthetic art.” The old question of whether art should be aesthetic or political is a poorly phrased question. In short, this study attempts to bring into discussion a series of important points: even if contemporary critical-political artists and their publics’ main focus is on the social and political usefulness of their art, this does not mean that aesthetic concerns should be de-emphasized. Of course, the way in which aesthetics has been traditionally defined and understood (narrowly and in terms of purity of perception, immediate pleasure and so on) is incompatible with contemporary political-critical art. Yet, all these developments in contemporary artistic practice have triggered a series of important implications for the aesthetic theory of art and not a dismissal of the aesthetic at the hands of the “social turn” in art.¹ As we know, traditional aesthetics is grounded in the traditional metaphysical distinction between object and subject (art object - beholder). In very general lines, something (an artistic or natural object) is “aesthetic” (in a traditional sense) if it is pleasing in appearance (where the pleasure is immediate and disinterested), and thus affords an autonomous (so called “aesthetic”) experience to the beholder. Apparently, contemporary political art is not pleasing in appearance and it does not occasion this kind of autonomous experience because the beholder’s experience is not pure but situated in a spatial, economic, cultural, and social context. Does this mean that political art is non-aesthetic art? This dissertation argues that political art actually is an aesthetic art if we revise and broaden the concept of the aesthetic. Many contemporary philosophers of art and art theorists proclaim “the end of art” (e.g., Arthur Danto, Donald Kuspit, Leon Rosenstein and others). They argue that “art,” as we used to know it, is dead because it has lost its aesthetic import at the hands of ideological interests.

This dissertation argues that aesthetics is not dead, but that it has only changed its face. Some aesthetic concepts have lost their weight (like contemplation and disinterestedness), having been replaced with others (collaboration/participation and interestedness). Furthermore, certain concepts have been reconfigured (such as representation that no longer connotes “imitation,” but simulation or re-enactment). Thus, when politically engaged art is at stake, aesthetic concerns are not de-emphasized or replaced by political-critical concerns.

¹ According to Claire Bishop, “social turn” in art has prompted “an ethical turn in art criticism.” What does this imply? The art pieces produced by artists and the artists themselves are judged by their working process, that is: “the degree to which they produce good or bad models of collaboration”. In other words, the “social turn” in art criticism means disregarding questions of aesthetics and focusing more on questions of politics (see Claire Bishop, ‘The Social Turn: Collaboration and Its Discontents’, Artforum International, vol. 44, No. 6, 2006).

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

First and foremost, I want to thank my principal supervisor David Weberman for supporting me during these past six years. He patiently provided invaluable advice, encouragement and assistance, so necessary for me to finish this dissertation. Next, I would like to warmly thank Professor, political artist and critical theorist Gregory Sholette for his guidance and suggestions and for reading earlier drafts from this dissertation. I'm grateful for our long and enriching conversations at the Queens College's art studio. I would like to acknowledge the financial support of the Central European University Foundation that provided the necessary funds for this research at the City University of New York.

I also thank Professor Michel Kelly for our invaluable conversations on the Encyclopedia of Aesthetics (forthcoming at Oxford University Press) and for his insights regarding a sufficiently rich understanding of aesthetics that accommodates various cultural, political and social phenomena that used to be considered "outsiders" by the Western aesthetics.

I am most grateful to Andruska, Misha and Dany for all their care, love, kindness, friendship and support. Last but not least, I would like to gratefully and sincerely thank all the artists on the margins, art collectives and 'outsider' art practitioners whose "politics of invisibility", as odd as may seem, still can make a difference (as fragile as it is) in the balance of power. If it does not always work, it is not because they don't struggle enough. It is mostly because there is no critical tradition to evaluate political art which will help them to strengthen their work. This dissertation is dedicated to them.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION.....	1
CHAPTER 1. POLITICAL ART: A CONCEPTUAL CLARIFICATION	12
1.1. What is art?.....	14
1.1.1. Is All Art Political?	21
1.1.2. Art and Politics: Can They Mix? Should They Mix?	24
1.1.3. What is Political in Art?	32
1.2. Propaganda Art vs. Political -Critical Art: In Totalitarian Regimes and in Liberal Democracies	38
1.2.1. Propaganda Art vs. Political Critical Art in Totalitarian Regimes	40
1.2.2. Political-Critical Art in Liberal Democracies	45
1.3. Conclusions	48
CHAPTER 2. POLITICAL-CRITICAL ART AND THE AESTHETIC	50
2.1. The Aesthetic	54
2.2. The Gap between the Aesthetic and Political in Art: “This is too Political” versus “This is Too Aesthetic”	65
2.3. The Aesthetic and Political-Critical Art: Bridging the Gap	71
2.4. Aesthetically Meaningful Form: Political-Critical Art as a Matter of Form.....	86
2.5. Conclusions	101
CHAPTER 3. REVISITING DISINTERESTEDNESS: POLITICAL-CRITICAL ART AND DISINTERESTEDNESS	103
3.1. Disinterestedness in the Light of the Eighteen Century and After	107
3.2. Is Disinterestedness Any Longer an Operational Term for Contemporary Aesthetics and Art Theory?.....	112
3.3. Cognitive Interests Cannot Be Ruled Out by “Aesthetic” Disinterestedness	115
3.4. Disinterestedness and Engagement: Reflective Contemplation	119
3.5. Is there any Disinterestedness Suitable for Political-Critical Art’s Spectator?.....	122
3.6. Rethinking Disinterestedness in Political-Critical Art’s Appreciation.....	130
3.7. Conclusions	137
CHAPTER 4. BEAUTY AND POLITICAL ART: IS REALLY BEAUTY AT ODDS WITH CRITICAL ENGAGEMENT?.....	139
4.1. Narrow Aesthetic Theories of Beauty.....	143

4.2. The Deliberate Avoidance of Beauty in Contemporary Political Art.....	152
4.3. Revisiting Kantian Theory of Dependent Beauty: Political Art and Dependent Beauty	160
4.4. Functional Beauty: Beauty and Function in Political Art	174
4.5. Conclusions	182

CHAPTER 5. THE EFFECTIVENESS QUESTION: IS CRITICAL ART POLITICALLY EFFECTIVE?..... 185

5.1. Political Art's Effectiveness: "What Does "Effective" Mean?" and "Are There Different Types of Effectiveness?"	186
5.2. What Reasons Are For Denying or Affirming the Political Effectiveness of Critical Art?	189
5.3. Is Political-Critical Art Most Effective Within an Institutional Setting or Outside of It?	190
5.4. To Whom Must Political-Critical Art be Addressed in Order for it to be Most Effective?	194
5.5. The Importance of the Means of Production and Distribution for Political-Critical Art's Effectiveness	199
5.6. Social Movements and Critical-Political Art	204
5.7. Conclusions	210

CONCLUSIONS 213

BIBLIOGRAPHY	221
--------------------	-----

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Figure 1: Unhealthy Aestheticism, FKSE (Studio of Young Artists Association), Budapest.

The Studio Gallery of the Young Artists Association, p.69.

Figure 2: Jean-August Dominique Ingres, The Martyr of Saint Symphorien, 1824, p.95.

Figure 3: Anonymous Art Collective, Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army, 2009, p.99.

Figure 4: Orlan, Omnipresence, 1993, p. 125.

Figure 5: Damien Hirst, Butterfly Series, 2003-2006, p.147.

Figure 6: Yasumasa Morimura, Self-Portrait-After Marilyn Monroe, gelatine silver prints, 1996, The Saatchi Gallery, 171.

Figure 7: Scene from the film The Elephant Man, directed by David Lynch, p.176.

Figure 8: Yanagi Miwa, My Grandmothers Series, work in progress, begun in 1999, p.180.

INTRODUCTION

The dissertation “Political-Critical Art and the Aesthetic” is an interdisciplinary piece of work, scrutinizing theories of art and politics from philosophy of art, political philosophy, sociology of art and critical theory. The relationship between art and politics is a contested one. It is not yet clear how to approach this relationship, what political art is and what the relationship between art, the political and the aesthetic is. In contemporary philosophy of art, in art theory and in critical studies there are major disagreements regarding the relationship between art and politics, on the one hand, and political art and the aesthetic, on the other. This thesis aims to clarify these very convoluted issues. To this end, it first attempts to conceptually clarify the meaning of “political art” and the relationship between “art” and “the political” (Chapter 1). At the same time, this research aims to bridge the gap between political art and the aesthetic, in spite of all discontent regarding their encountering (Chapter 2, 3 and 4). Chapter 2 argues for an enlargement of the concept of the aesthetic which accommodates extra-perceptual, political and other contemporary arts. Chapter 3 attempts to re-consider the 18th century understanding of the aesthetic disinterestedness (Shaftesbury’s) as opposed to the 20th century understanding of the term (Stolnitz’s). The topic of disinterestedness cannot be excluded from the discussion on the aesthetic because “much of the history of more recent thinking about the concept of the aesthetic can be seen as the history of the development of disinterest theses” (James Shelley). In this chapter I argue that we still have to preserve a certain instance of aesthetic disinterestedness in attending political art but this “disinterestedness” has to be understood more in Shaftesbury’s way (but not identical with Shaftesbury’s) than in Stolnitz’s. Chapter 4 deals with beauty. Traditionally beauty has been considered the paradigmatic aesthetic quality of art. At different times the aesthetic has been identified with the idea of beautiful (to be aesthetic means to be beautiful).

Many theorists find political art non-beautiful (mostly because of its unappealing look). I argue that beauty is not at odds with critical engagement because beauty is not a matter of how the object looks. Political art does not need to look pleasing in order to be considered beautiful. Chapter 5 focuses on political art's effectiveness.

In the first chapter I attempt to provide a conceptual clarification of the term 'political art'. The common sense understanding of political art as "art with a political message and content" is problematic on many grounds. It fails to acknowledge the fact that political art is not exclusively a matter of content or message. It assumes falsely that political art must be political in an overt sense. And, it fails to distinguish political art that is propaganda from political art that is not propaganda. There is confusion concerning the question of what should be considered 'political' in art and a great controversy regarding the degree to which art and politics should or can mix. The aim of this chapter is twofold.

Firstly, this chapter aims to conceptually clarify the term political art. To complete this aim I first discuss what 'art' means and what 'political' means. The controversy regarding the relation of art and politics is due mostly to two views with which I take issue: first, "all art is political" and second, the theory which holds that politics takes place in political institutions and should not or cannot take place in art (the two autonomist claims "art and politics cannot mix" or "art and politics can mix, but they should not"). I deny the claim that "all art is political" on the grounds that: it's potentially politically harmful to view everything as political, because it takes the force out of things that undoubtedly are political² and on the grounds that the statement that "all art is political" destroys both the concept of "the political" and the concept of "art" by expanding them to mean everything. I also deny both autonomist claims (i. "art and politics cannot mix" and ii. "art and politics can mix but they should not") on the grounds that both theories inappropriately regard the autonomy of art in terms of separateness (i. whether of the art-work as an end in itself or of ii. a mode of experience with which it is associated). Political art's autonomy is not a matter of separateness (a separate object/a separate experience). We can understand the autonomy of political art in different terms: by criticizing socially, politically and culturally imposed hierarchies of values, art gains its autonomy and its potential for resistance without needing to be a separate realm.

² Noël Carroll, interview with Ray Privett and James Kreul in Senses of Cinema, source: <http://sensesofcinema.com/2001/13/carroll/> (last accessed 7 May 2013).

Secondly, I want to clearly distinguish political art that is propaganda from political art that is not propaganda (as I call it critical- political art). Why is this distinction important? The reason it is important to distinguish between the two is this: In my view, propaganda art is only political in a deficient or minimal sense of the term. Propaganda art is political in the sense that it is concerned with politics. It is deficiently political however, because it circumvents critical evaluation and affirms a political status quo or a cause without appealing to any deliberative or rational capacities of the viewer. Critical-political art is not only about politics but it appeals to the viewer as a political being in possession of the faculties needed for genuine political participation and deliberation. For this reason, my thesis is concerned with political-critical art and not with propaganda art. I suggest distinctive ways of framing the meaning of political art because these conceptual demarcations are nevertheless crucial for understanding the ways in which the public engages with political art. I conclude that political art, in its narrow and robust sense, is that art that deliberately sets out to critically intervene in power relations by challenging the imposed hierarchies and values (cultural, economic or social). This understanding of political art allows us to distinguish between works of art which are political only in a lax and deficient sense (like propaganda art) from works of art which are not merely dealing with a political topic or confirm the hegemony but critically resist the status quo(critical-political art).

Chapter two attempts to provide a sound way of joining the aesthetic and political art, in spite of all discontent regarding the encountering between the two. Many theorists hold that there is a gap between political art and the aesthetic. Why there appears to be a gap for these theorists?

The first category of detractors (e.g. Donald Kuspit, Hilton Kramer) argues that political art is not proper/good art because the encountering between politics and art undermines the aesthetic dimension of art (the aesthetic value of art). They assume that political art is a confrontational art, dealing with problems of injustice or abuses of power while the aesthetic is something which has to do with a pleasurable experience (of a special kind). Political art, these critics claim, does not operate primarily via the aesthetic: it is not an aesthetic art because its purpose is not to afford us an aesthetic experience but to make us angry for example, about society's problems. They conclude that political art does not have an aesthetic purpose and this makes it a lesser art (bad art).

The second theoretical camp also argues that there is a gap between political art and the aesthetics but for different reasons than the first category of theorists. This theoretical position holds that the aesthetic is an "ideological construct" (Terry Eagleton, Paul de Man, Griselda Pollock, Roger Taylor and Pierre Bourdieu among many others) or an instrument of "evasion" (Raymond Williams) which usually supports and popularize the values of the status quo (cultural elites). The argument which underlines this claim goes like that: the real function of the aesthetic is that of an ideology. This ideology imposes what is good art. For this theoretical camp, the most frequent critique of the aesthetic asserts that the aesthetic is an ideological construct: "It's classical vocabulary of disinterestedness, immediacy, wholeness, universal value, genius, and the like, strike one as outdated, naïve, and perhaps as even a covert collaboration with a self-interested hegemonic politics"³. Griselda Pollock claims that political art must reject all forms of aesthetic value because the aesthetic requirements of unity and pleasant form damage the political message.

³ Terry Eagleton, The ideology of the Aesthetic, Oxford: Blackwell, 1990, p.34.

Against both categories of critics, I argue that political art does not need to be evaluated in accordance with the notion of the aesthetic they are employing. It seems that both categories of critics conflate the aesthetic with a pure aesthetic approach to art. However, as I argue in this chapter, the aesthetic is one thing and a pure aesthetic is another. Both categories of critics (1) and (2) fail to make this distinction. The first category of critics identifies the aesthetic with a particular and influential historical version of it, namely, the purist version of the aesthetic.⁴ The second category of critics also reduces the complexity of the aesthetic to a purist understanding of the concept. These critics see the aesthetic as a merely sensual experience (and as a way of engaging the ideology of the elites).

What I hope to envision in this chapter is a revision and an enlargement of the understandings of the aesthetic which will accommodate political-critical art. Before putting forth my arguments, it has to be firstly explained what counts as the aesthetic. My argument proceeds in four steps. In the first section of this chapter, I will focus on the concept of the aesthetic attempting to highlight its traditional meanings. The second section critically evaluates the two categories of detractors of the encountering between political-critical art and the aesthetic (the theoretical positions which hold that there is a gap between political art and the aesthetic).

The need for a revised understanding of the aesthetic according to which non-perceptual properties of art are still aesthetic features will be the focus of the third section. It is quite clear that “the aesthetic” has undergone nowadays substantial redefinition and enlargement. This enlargement of the concept of the aesthetic (for example, as envisaged by James Shelley) accommodates political, conceptual and radical art. By accepting non-perceptual aesthetic features in art appreciation and experiencing, the gap between political art and the aesthetic can fruitfully be bridged.

⁴ Responsible for this purist version of the aesthetic are the modernist formalist tradition (Bell, Fry, Hanslick, Gurney, Greenberg, Fried, Prall) and the attitude theorists (Stolnitz and Bullough). A pure aesthetic approach to art embraces several ideas: Works of art only have aesthetic properties and purposes (and the aesthetic properties are formal and purely perceptual properties); works of art are or ought to be Fine Art or “High Art”; and we should understand and appreciate works of art in total detachment from their social, historical or political contexts.

Section four also argues for bridging the gap between the aesthetic and political art by considering the aesthetic of form as an aesthetic of meaning. The aesthetic has been identified (in the purist versions of it) with the formal aspect of the work. By this token, political art is usually defined as a matter of content and meaning (for this reason it is also seen as non-aesthetic/bad art). The formula “content versus aesthetics” (held in the purist aesthetic accounts on art) is not just a way of demarcating content from form but it is also an understanding of the aesthetic (form) as opposed to art’s subject matter (meaning) or the idea it puts forth. In this understanding, form is seen as the aesthetic component of art which is completely meaningless and depoliticized and the content is considered as the non-aesthetic, political counterpart of the form. In this section, I challenge this view. I argue that political art is not only a matter of content but of form too. I argue that form is not the depoliticized structure of the art piece while content is the aesthetically devaluated political significance of it (not only art’s content has a function and a meaning (political) but also art’s form).

Chapter three argues that we can shed a positive light on interestedness in attending political-critical art, without radically displacing the traditional and contested aesthetic disinterestedness.⁵ Disinterestedness was considered the paradigmatic concept of aesthetics and the hallmark of modernist aesthetics. For the 20th century aesthetician, “disinterested” means “no concern for any ulterior purpose” (Jerome Stolnitz’s definition). According to this understanding, we pay attention to art disinterestedly (our attention is not interested in what the object may say or do). Stolnitz holds that we cannot have an aesthetic experience of an object unless we don't perceive the object in certain, aesthetic way (the disinterested attitude). If we accept this understanding of disinterestedness, political-critical art cannot be aesthetically experienced because the viewer will care about "the ulterior purposes" of this art (the apprehension will be an interested one).

⁵ To this end I attempt to re-consider the 18th century understanding of the aesthetic disinterestedness (Shaftesbury’s) as opposed to the 20th century understanding of the term (Stolnitz’s).

Political-critical art strives to arouse viewer's awareness of the mechanism of domination. Thus we can talk more about an active use of art, rather than a passive (disinterested) response to it. Should we preserve then an instance of aesthetic disinterestedness in attending politically concerned art? A contemporary philosopher of art⁶ (to my knowledge, the only one) holds that she has found a middle ground: we can have both interested and disinterested apprehending of political art with one condition: to switch our attention from a disinterested mode to an interested one (in this way political art is experienced both in an interested and in a disinterested manner). Brand's account may still be questioned especially because of the difficulties resting exactly in the core of her argument – "the switch of attentions". She does not offer a viable solution for the disinterested apprehending of politically-charged art because she still reduces disinterestedness to attention and perception (the "switch between interested (political) and disinterested (aesthetic) attention is the core of her argument).

What I propose instead is a re-thinking of disinterestedness by changing the focus of disinterestedness as a mode of attention to thinking of disinterestedness as a matter of motivations and reasons (on the grounds that our motivations and reasons can be interested or disinterested while the attention cannot be).⁷ This understanding of disinterestedness echoes Shaftesbury's (the 18th century understanding of the concept of disinterestedness). Unlike the 20th century understanding of disinterestedness which eliminates from aesthetic experience all interests (Stolnitz's), Shaftesbury opposes "disinterestedness" to a specific type of interests only (like the interest for the sake of a pecuniary bargain and other selfish or immoral interests).

⁶ Peggy Zeglin Brand, "Disinterestedness and political Art", in Paradoxa, No. 9, 1999.

⁷ Robert McGregor holds that attention is primitive, that is, attention does not divide up into different kinds (see Robert McGregor, "Art and the Aesthetic", Journal of Aesthetic and Art Criticism, Summer 1974, pp. 549-559).

In the first section of this chapter, I discuss both the traditional (the 18th century) and the modernist (the 20th century) meanings of the term disinterestedness. In the second section, I present and take issue with those contemporary theorists who reject any form of disinterestedness from political art and contemporary art's appreciation. In the third section, I show how at least cognitive interests cannot be ruled out from disinterested appreciation of art. In section four, I critically evaluate Brand's solution ("the switch of attentions") in political art's experiencing. Section five discusses the idea of "active contemplation" (attempting to prove that there is no conflict between "disinterestedness" and "engagement" in political art aesthetic appreciation). In the last section, I argue that political art cannot be experienced in a disinterested manner (as that proposed by Stolnitz or Brand) because to maintain the centrality of a disinterested attention means to sustain the aesthetic attitude which means independence of moral judgments and political judgments. The kind of disinterestedness which seems suitable for critical art apprehension is to some extent closer to the 18th century understanding of it (but, as I will show, it is not identical with it). Disinterestedness is not the lack or absence of all interests but it is opposed to pecuniary or selfish interests (and other morally questionable interests). Disinterestedness is a "noble" word denoting an ethical attitude and not a privative concept as the absence of all interests.

Chapter four argues that beauty is not at odds with political art. Traditionally beauty is taken to be an ability of some objects to arise in viewers a distinctive type of unmediated pleasure – aesthetic pleasure. Typically it is argued that beauty in an aesthetic sense has no function (excepting the pleasure it affords) and our responses to it are immediate responses (we just sense that something is beautiful without asking why that something is beautiful). According to this understanding of beauty, political-critical art does not seem to raise in viewers the feeling of aesthetic pleasure (mostly because of its unappealing look). In this chapter I argue that beauty should not be restricted to a certain restricted type of pleasure. Beauty, in political art's case, seems to be a difficult, demanding and not an immediately recognizable one (because of its unappealing look), but this does not mean that it lacks or is at odds with critical engagement (as some theorists have argued). Beauty is neither something in the object (as Kant rightly pointed out) nor something in the viewer's eyes only.

Unlike the common, traditional understanding of beauty as that which is immediately pleasant to senses, I endorse an understanding of beauty as a way of experiencing the relationships between what is out there (in the object) and what is in our mind about what is out there ("experiencing" does not mean "sensually perceiving" but rather grasping an idea and the way in which that idea is expressed through art forms). In this light, not everything that looks beautiful is in fact beautiful. Nor does every beautiful thing look good at the first sight. Political art is a type of art which does not strike us with beauty at the first sight. Many critical artists and activist artists deliberately produce an art as unappealing to the senses as possible (their attitude could be called kalliphobia – 'beauty phobia'). In doing this they hope to distance their art both from the mainstream art world and from the art market.⁸ Yet, even if political art is not created with the purpose to please the viewer can be still a beautiful art if its meaning (and its function) is beautiful.

My argument proceeds in four parts. In the first section, I set forth and take issue with those narrow views which mistakenly identify the locus of beauty in disinterested experiences and unmediated pleasure. I also present and take issue with the popular view that beauty has no function "beyond the pleasure it generates".

⁸ Max Ernst used to claim that my art is "not meant to attract, but to make people scream" (see Arthur Danto, Unnatural Wonders: Essays from the Gap Between Art and Life, Macmillan, 2005); the historical Avant-Garde (Dada movements) has opened a conceptual gap between art and beauty in which other aesthetic qualities might flow.

The second part critically examines two contemporary theoretical attitudes regarding the unsuitableness of beauty's presence in political art: according to the first, beauty is too weak and consequently useless; according to the second, on the contrary, beauty is too powerful and consequently damaging (for the beholder). On these grounds, pursuing beauty in critical art is avoided deliberately by many contemporary political artists.

In the third section I argue that political-critical art is characterized by a dependent type of beauty (beauty a thing has as a thing of a certain kind and with a certain function) as opposed to free beauty (as something we like it freely on its own account, independent of what it is and what it does). Political-critical art can claim a dependent beauty (an impure, "difficult" and not straightforward pleasurable type of beauty) without being compelled to submit itself, at the same time, to the free beauty. Why do I need to show that dependent beauty is not compelled to submit to the free beauty? Some aestheticians claim that only the judgment of free beauty remains within the aesthetic realm, while the judgment of dependent beauty (being an impure judgment) does not. By understanding political art's beauty in terms of dependent beauty I attempt to show that beauty is not and should not be understood narrowly as self-subsistent because beauty is not independent of concerns with (a) conceptual classification (the beauty a thing has as a thing of a certain kind) and (b) functionality (beauty a thing has as a thing with a certain function). To this end, I revise in depth the Kantian distinction between free and dependent beauty attempting to show that beauty in art's case is always dependent and never pure (free beauty). The aesthetic judgment of dependent beauty we make need not be grounded in the first place in any judgment of free beauty and this independence still remains within the aesthetic realm.

The fourth section attempts to argue that political-critical art can be "functionally beautiful" (that is, the dependent beauty a thing has as a thing with a certain function(s)).

Chapter five attempts to answer several interrelated questions. Each of which has to do with the issue of “effectiveness” in political-critical art’s case. There is no single or simple answer to what does “effective” mean. In order to clarify if political-critical art is effective or not, this chapter will address the following set of questions. In the first section I try to investigate what does “effective” mean and whether there are different types of effectiveness. The second section deals with the reasons for denying or affirming the political effectiveness of critical art. The next section tries to investigate whether political-critical art is most effective within an institutional setting or rather outside of it. Section four asks to whom must political-critical art be addressed in order for it to be most effective, while section five investigates what kind of mechanisms of production and distribution of political-critical art makes it most efficient. Finally, I deal with the question of political-critical effectiveness within the social movements.

The conclusion will be that political-critical art can be effective in many ways and that is the reason why the question of ‘effectiveness’ should be addressed from many perspectives (because to be politically effective does not only mean, for example, to “stop a war”, to defeat hegemony or to make a politician resign).

CHAPTER 1. POLITICAL ART: A CONCEPTUAL CLARIFICATION

'Art about politics is not necessarily political art' (Duncombe and Lambert, An Open Letter to Critics Writing on Political Art)⁹

What is political art? Clearly, this question admits of no immediately straightforward answer. There is no immediately straightforward answer because the formula “political art” contains two concepts: ‘art’ and ‘political’ and each of which is a matter of contestation. At the same time, it is not enough or accurate to merely assert that political art is something like “art with a political message or content” (a common sense understanding of political art).¹⁰ This formulation is tautological because it appeals to the terms “political” and “art” to define “political art” and thus goes in a circle. At the same time, this common sense definition of political art is problematic for at least three reasons.

Firstly, it assumes that political art must be political in an overt sense. Secondly, it fails to acknowledge the fact that political art is not exclusively a matter of content but of form (or style) too.¹¹ Thirdly, it fails in distinguishing between political art which is propaganda art and political art which is not propaganda art (I will argue below that this distinction is essential).

The aim of this chapter is twofold. Firstly, this chapter aims to conceptually clarify the term “political art”. To complete this aim I need to first discuss what ‘art’ means and what ‘political’ means. There is a great debate concerning the question of whether politics and art should or can mix. This controversy regarding the relation of art and politics is due mostly to two views which I will take issue: first, that art is always political (“all art is political”) and second, that art and politics cannot really mix because each of them necessarily belongs to a separate realm.

⁹ Center for Artistic Activism, source: <http://artisticactivism.org/2012/10/an-open-letter-to-critics-writing-about-political-art/> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

¹⁰ This common sense definition of political art is entrenched in art theories and common language very much. For instance Amy Mullin holds that “political art designates art that explores political subject matter but it is not made in a way that involves political action” (Amy Mullin, “Feminist Art and The Political Imagination”, Hypatia, Vol. 18, No. 4, Fall 2003, link: <http://www.public.asu.edu/~kleong/activistarttheory.pdf>).

¹¹ This will be largely treated in the second chapter of this dissertation.

Secondly, this chapter attempts to clearly distinguish political art that is propaganda from political art that is not propaganda (as I call it, critical-political art). Why is this distinction important? The reason it is important to distinguish between the two is this: In my view, propaganda art is only political in a deficient or minimal sense of the term. Propaganda art is political in the sense that it is concerned with politics. It is deficiently political however, because it circumvents critical evaluation and affirms a political status quo without appealing to any deliberative or rational capacities of the viewer. Critical-political art is not only about politics but it appeals to the viewer as a political being in possession of the faculties needed for genuine political participation. For this reason, my thesis is concerned with political-critical art and not with propaganda art.

It is commonly held, as already mentioned, in art theory that political art is that type of art which deals with politics, or delivers a political message. But, as I will argue, this is both a loose way of speaking and a problematic understanding of political art. I don't endorse this largely accepted understanding and I assume that those theorists who call art "political" in this fashion operate with a simplistic and reductive conception of the political. I'm going to argue later that if we understand it this way, then political art and propaganda art (which is political only in a lax and very general sense) are considered as being "political" in the same sense and to the same degree (while they are not equally "political").

This chapter's conclusion will be that political art, in this sense at issue here, is that art which criticizes and opposes the status quo of the moment and gives a voice to those who are marginal, forgotten and excluded. Political art is art that critically intervene in relations of power and it does not merely reflect on them. In its narrow, critical sense, political art is not merely a container of political messages (as propaganda is) but it is politically polyvalent in its criticality. It needs a certain flexibility of movement in order to make room for interpretation. It cannot be chained down by a single political message imposed from above. Propaganda art, on the contrary, does not pose questions of meaning and interpretation.

1.1. What is art?

Many definitions of art have been proposed by philosophers, artists and art critics: functional definitions, procedural definitions, historical definitions and so on. Until this moment there is no definition of art free from criticism. I will not discuss here all the definitions of art and the objections to them because I don't hope to solve this complicated problem here and now, but what I want to do is to adopt a useful (working) definition which will allow me to distinguish art from non-art. Why do I need that? To put it shortly, I need it because political art's practice is sometimes considered indistinguishable from political actions (which are not art). Nina Felshin posits that in the light of the features which political art has in common with non-artistic forms of political activism, the proper answer to the question "But is it art?"¹² is "What does it matter?" (if the piece fulfils its critical purpose). My response to Felshin is that it does matter because, otherwise, why would she bother calling it "art". At the same time, it does matter in order to make sense of our practices with regard to the sphere of art.

There is a long tradition of trying to examine art either by providing a definition in terms of necessary and sufficient conditions (essentialism) or by tracing its contours as an indefinable, open-ended concept (anti-essentialism). Some theorists (following Wittgenstein) are sceptical about any possibility of defining art in an essentialist way (i.e. Morris Weitz). They usually hold that art cannot be defined in terms of necessary and sufficient conditions because to define it this way would mean to find a common trait which resides in all arts - a common trait which the so different arts do not in fact possess. Other theorists question not only the essentialist definitions of art but also the assumed monism of the art concept, claiming that the art concept is not a monistic concept but a pluralist concept. Christy Mag Uidhir and P.D. Magnus argue that both art essentialists and art anti-essentialists share an implicit assumption of art concept monism, disagreeing only about the structure of that art concept: “We argue that this is a mistake. Species concept pluralism - a well-explored position in philosophy of biology – provides a model for art concept pluralism”.¹³ The point these philosophers of biology try to make is that different art concepts are useful for different purposes and a monist concept of art would never be exhaustive (to encompass the plurality of disparate art kinds, art forms, and art functions).

¹² Nina Felshin, 'But is it Art? The Spirit of Art as Activism', Nina Felshin (ed.), Bay Press, Seattle, 1995.

Yet, for the purpose of this thesis I need to distinguish art from non-art. Many in today’s art world hold that virtually anything can be art. I need an efficient and convincing way for distinguishing art from anything else for avoiding sterile conclusions of the type “everything is or can be art”. Maybe the difference between art and non-art is no longer simply visible/perceivable (especially after Fountain and Brillo Boxes) but it is still there. Even if any object can be a work of art does not mean that a work of art can be that kind of object. For my purposes, the notion of “the art world(s)” provides the tool to separate art from non-art. In the attempt to make sense of what is art and how can we distinguish it from non-art, I will adopt a view that combines Arthur Danto’s¹⁴ and Howard Becker’s understandings of art and art world(s). “X is art” if X is an artifact brought into existence by the “art world(s)”. By “artifact” I understand a product of some human activity (not necessarily a product of human work), as opposed to a natural kind. Even in the case of the “found objects”

¹³ Christy Mag Uidhir and P. D. Magnus, “Art Concept Pluralism”, Metaphilosophy, Vol. 42 (1-2), 2011, pp. 83-97.

¹⁴ I have to note here that I look only at Danto’s concept of the “artworld” (namely, its role in fixing art’s identity and interpretation) from his 1964 article “The Artworld”. For the moment I don’t deal with the other two conditions of something to be art (“aboutness” and “embodiment”) put forth by Danto latter on.

(the readymade) of natural kind, a procedure is applied in order to be considered an art piece. For example a driftwood becomes an artifact with some human action (the artist picks it up, brings it to art gallery etc). By “art-world(s)”, I understand certain theoretical environments within which a work of art is done, apprehended and distributed. Danto says that the “atmosphere of theory” does not refer to any kind of theory held by artists or art critics but to a theory provided by the art historical context in which the work is produced. If something can be art at a certain moment within the history of art depends on what has become art up to that time. Art is a kind of thing that depends for its existence upon theories of art. Without these theories we cannot distinguish art from non-art: “black paint is just black paint” and not painting. These theoretical environments make art possible and allow us to identify it as art and to distinguish it from non-art. Yet, these theoretical environments are not necessarily the institutions of art or the mainstream (the official) institutions of art.

Until now we have two main philosophical theories of the “art world”: Arthur Danto’s (in his article from 1964 – “The Artworld”) and George Dickie’s influential “institutional theory of art” (there are two versions of it: one from 1974 and the other from 1997),¹⁵ in which he claims that the art world is an institution represented by critics, artists, theorists, curators and other people acting on behalf of a certain institution, who confer the status of art only for artifacts. Thus, the notion of art world was appropriated and used by Dickie and others in the development of the institutional theory of art overlooking Danto’s initial recommendations. The main difference between Danto’s view and Dickie’s lies exactly in the institutional-issue. Roughly put it, the art world is an institution for Dickie (it is an institutional structure which generates power to confer the status of art to artifacts) while for Danto is constituted by “art history and an atmosphere of theory”. Because of the enormous importance attached to art world by Danto, he is wrongly sometimes regarded as a proponent of the “institutional theory of art”, even if he never said that he had an institutional theory of art. For Danto the art world is not an institution. As Jeffrey Wieand suggests, the art world in Danto’s understanding should be regarded as a kind of community: when somebody speaks of the ‘college community’ he does not mean only the students and employees of the college (of the institution), but also of people more or less connected with the college (retired professors, alumni, persons who read college’s newspaper). “The community, in other words, consisted of all those people whose lives were affected by college and who, in turn, affected it. I suggest that the art world is a community rather like this”.¹⁶

¹⁵ The 1974 definition of art holds that a work of art “in the classificatory sense is (1) an artifact (2) a set of the aspects of which has had conferred upon it the status of candidate for appreciation by some person or persons acting on behalf of a certain social institution (the art world)” (George Dickie, Art and the Arsthetic: An Institutional Analysis, Cornell University Press, Ithaca, 1974, p. 34). The 1997 definitions state that (1) an artist is a person who participates with understanding in the making of a work of art; 2. a work of art is an artifact of a kind created to be presented to an art world public; 3. A public is a set of persons the members of which are prepared in some degree to understand an object which is presented to them; 4. The art world is the totality of all artworld systems; 5. An art world system is a framework for the presentation of a work of art by an artist to an art world public (George Dickie, The Art Circle, New York: Haven, 1984, pp. 79-111).

Beside these philosophical definitions of the “art world” offered by philosophers of art we cannot neglect the importance of other contributions. Sociologist Howard S. Becker used the plural term art worlds to describe the diversity of possible art productions and networks of distribution (he has developed this concept after Dickie’s in 1982). These art worlds have flexible boundaries and, sometimes the aesthetics of one art world criticizes the other. New and parallel “art worlds” have emerged as reaction to mainstream institutions and theories of art (for example, The Independent Media Center of Philadelphia which used to edit an independent Aesthetic Journal). Political art has its own alternative art world (or art worlds). Usually it manifests its opposition vis a vis the mainstream, globalized art world (understood in the institutional, Dickian sense). But, even if these alternative art worlds have emerged as reaction to the globalized one, they also consist in an atmosphere of art theory and art history (but the theory is a critical theory of art and art history is a history from below).

¹⁶ Jeffrey Wieand, ‘Can There Be an Institutional Theory of Art?’, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 39, No. 4 (Summer, 1981), p. 413.

In my view, Danto and Becker's understandings of art (in terms of "art world (s)") are the most suitable for my purposes. Why? Unlike other definitions of art, these definitions (the combination of the two) do not restrict art-hood to either compositional elements which can be aesthetically perceived by the means of the five senses (functionalist definitions) or to those objects which had been acquired the art status because some persons acting on the behalf of a certain social institution say so (Dickie's institutional definition).

Functionalist definitions of art take some function(s) to be definitive of artworks. Usually they take the concept of the aesthetic (or some allied concept like the formal or expressive) as essential in identifying art. Our access to these formal or expressive properties of art is considered to be mediated by sensing. Then, if we accept this stance, many instances of contemporary art would be considered non-art because we experience them differently. Perhaps, we could work more on the concept of the aesthetic by extending it to non-perceptual properties (as Shelley 2003, Carroll 2004, etc). In this case, a functionalist definition would be workable for distinguishing art from non-art without leaving outside a considerable amount of contemporary art production (conceptual, political, radical art and so on). That is why, I stated above, that other contemporary definitions of art could be compatible with my understanding of art (in the sense that if we hold a less restrictive view of the aesthetic, then it should not be a problem that art as art exhibits aesthetic properties which are not perceptual). In this light, Danto's definition of art in terms of "artworld" could be conjoined with a less restrictive, functionalist definition. As long as this less restrictive functionalist theory allows non-perceptual art to inhere the class of art, Danto's requirement ("to see something as art requires something the eye cannot decry") seems to be not contradicted.

Unlike institutional definitions of art, the "art-world (s)" theory does not tend to side with the institutions of authority and power (that is, with the mainstream, established art “heavies”). Even if the ‘art-world’ is seen by Dickie in his new, 1997’s definition, as an aggregation of art-worlds (“the Art-world is the totality of all art-world systems”), this definition still has problems: it is circular. At the same time Dickie still maintains (in his new definition) the touch of a hierarchy when he claims that “the institution” (who decides what is art and what is not art) includes “the essential core” and the peripheral groups.¹⁷ The art-world is made visible in the institutional account only through the mainstream institutions. The art piece is always presented in an institutional context (in a museum, gallery, biennial, catalogue etc). This does not mean that art pieces cannot be produced in alternative, peripheral spaces as well but, obviously, the official art institutions create the visible structures and hierarchies in the presentation and dissemination of art as art. The art-world, in an institutional definition, typically represents itself as a top-down process. The mainstream art institutions cannot constitute the boundaries through which something becomes “art” because they are just the bureaucratic confinements of art production, reception and distribution. In this way, any despotic political regime could decree what is art and what is whatever else just on the basis of its art institutions of power. Besides that, another reason for rejecting the strong institutionalism in defining art is that for every work of art, there is some reason or other that the institution has for saying that it is a work of art.¹⁸

I agree that the “art-world” is a sort of condition for something to be art (here both Dickie and Danto’s theories seem to converge). Art is defined in this way relationally (taking into account the whole context of the artwork; historical, economical or social) surpassing the belief that the aesthetic perception alone can be enough to discriminate art from non-art (see Danto’s slogan that “art is not something that the eye can decry”). But Danto’s definition of the “art-world” differs from Dickie’s. To put it shortly, in Danto’s art-world, art history and art theory are the most important factors for identifying art, while Dickie’s art-world is more sociological. In other words, Danto's art-world is a world of ideas and Dickie's art -world is a world of artists and their publics organized around the art institutions.

¹⁷ See George Dickie, Art Circle: A Theory of Art. Chicago: Spectrum Press, 1997.

¹⁸ Derek Matravers distinguishes between strong and weak institutionalism but criticizes both of them (“The Institutional Theory: A Protean Creature”, British Journal of Aesthetics, 2000).

It can finally be concluded, that something does not become art just because some persons acting on the behalf of social institutions say so. Art has to involve certain awareness about itself as a practice in order to demarcate it from other activities (which may look similar but are not art). Moreover, something is art when we have the theoretical framework (an art history and theory) to understand that something as art. The "theory and history" are not necessarily only the mainstream/official ones. Every art-world is framed by a certain atmosphere of theory but, as I have already mentioned, in some cases the theory is a critical theory of art and art history is an art history from below. Yet, this history and theory is crucial for defining art in general (and political art in particular). The very concept of art has evolved in relationship to the evolution of art history and art theory. That is why some objects lacking art hood during a historical period attain that status during other periods.

Danto's type of understanding of art (in terms of "artworld(s)") is useful to my approach for several reasons: (1) it helps delimitating art from non-art, art from life and the artistic readymade from commodity (in the political art's case we can delimit an art protest from a mere protest); (2) it allows the possibility of art production outside the mainstream institutions of art (art history and art theory are not necessarily the official ones and the 'art world' is more a theoretical atmosphere than an institutional elite); (3) it makes room for objects and situations which have been not considered art in the past (avant-garde, conceptual/political art); (4) it tries to define art without using evaluative concepts (he claims that we don't have to evaluate a piece according to its genre or style but "individually"; from this it does not follow that art is equally and indifferently "good"); (5) a pluralistic "artworld" is a more democratic art world in the sense that the access to art is not limited to the lucky few.

1.1.1. Is All Art Political?

In what follows, I will scrutinize the relationship between art and politics by objecting to two popular views: “all art is political” and “no genuine art is political”. The first view holds that all art is political because all human activity is political. It is sometimes taken for granted (without much further elaboration) that art, like any other human activity, is always political and cannot be political in one way or another (in the sense of supporting or rejecting power). For many art and cultural studies theorists, it makes no sense to distinguish between political and non-political art because “all art is inherently political”. Diego Rivera, August Wilson, Wafaa Bilal (artists), Anne Lynnot (curator), Jaques Ranciere and Chantal Mouffe (political philosophers), are only a few who argue that all art is political. Some theorists hold that all art is political in the same way that every choice we make is political, others claim that “all art is political in the sense that it serves someone’s politics”¹⁹ and others claim that there is no such thing as non-political art because the political is ubiquitous in all social relations.²⁰

The most common argument for “all art is political” assertion is that all human activity is political (and art is a human activity) because all human activity is shaped by structures involving power relations. Daniel Van Der Gucht argues that the 20th century developed the new relativist paradigm “everything is political/everything is art” – with the element added by Beuys, “everyone is an artist”.²¹ Both formulas seem sterile saying nothing about politics or about art. “Everything is political” formula stems from the assumption that no matter what we do – or, for that matter, do not do – we make a political statement, and thus take political action of some kind. But, as Chris Bateman points out (and I agree with that) this claim seems “counter-productive” – “for if everything is political, why take political action?”²²

¹⁹ August Wilson, The Paris Review, Winter 1999, p. 12.

²⁰ See Chantal Mouffe, On The Political, Routledge, London-New York, 2005, p. 16.

²¹ Daniel Van Der Gucht, Pour en finir avec la mythologie de l’artiste politique: de l’engagement a la responsabilite, in Eric Van Essche (ed.), ‘Les Formes Contemporaines d’Art Engage’, Collection Essais, Bruxelles, 2007, pp.59-68.

On the one hand, not all human activity is political because some has no political import (like eating, tying shoelaces and so on). On the other hand, this position seems to me very unhelpful and unsubtle. It is like saying that all food is poison because all food contains bacteria. It's true that all food contains bacteria and bacteria can poison but we can distinguish between foods that are really dangerous for your health and foods that are not. Same with political art: not all art is political just because all art is a result of a human activity and all human activity is influenced by power relations. Some human activities are political and others are not (and some human activities are more political than others). If all art is political (according to this understanding of the political), is all art equally political? Is Kuo Hsi's Clearing Autumn Skies over Mountains and Valleys as political as Oleg Kulik's I Bite America and America Bites Me?

Art and politics have always been related but art is not always political and should be considered sometimes as mere entertainment, as a skill, as the expression of a deep private and personal feeling or emotion (like the emotion in front of a sunset from nature). An artist who is painting literally a particular political event isn't necessarily taking a political stance but just painting something that moves him. There is art which is neutral to society's problems and injustices, art which does not intend to criticize or oppose the mechanisms of domination and power or to support the status quo. There are many examples of non-political art: the majority of landscape art,²³ landscaping, accidental art, some of the naïve art and folk art (like embroidery, naïve painting, naïve religious painting), textile art (excluding the Chilean arpilleras de adorno which are political²⁴ and perhaps the pseudo-naïve professional painters' art), and other individual examples of art from different genres and styles which don't express, suggest, allude or intend to support or to criticize hegemonic power over something. A footnote is needed here: choosing to make functional art, naïve art, ornamental art is not always a political statement but the choice of materials could be (like for example Arte Povera which deliberately uses very cheap and previously used materials on purpose). There are obviously many more examples of non-political art that could be mentioned. I don't pretend to list them exhaustively here. The point I want to make is that we can distinguish non-political art from political art. As Noël Carroll rightly argues, "it's potentially politically pernicious to regard everything as political, because it takes the force out of things that clearly are political".²⁵ I will only add to Carroll's statement that "all art is political" claim destroys both the concept of the political and the concept of art by expanding them to mean everything and nothing. If "all art is political" then what does art mean and what does "political" mean?

²² See Chris Bateman's article The Activist's Argument (Everything is Political), source: http://onlyagame.typepad.com/only_a_game/2010/05/the-activists-argument-everything-is-political.html.

²³ For example in East Asia the classic Chinese mountain-water ink painting was traditionally the most prestigious form of visual art, while the landscape painting in the West until the 19th century occupied a low position in the accepted hierarchy of the genres.

²⁴ Originally, these arpilleras were exclusively detailed hand-sewn, three dimensional textile pictures which tell the story of those who disappeared during the dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet in the 1970s. In another instance, women political prisoners who were held captive during the Pinochet dictatorship used arpilleras to camouflage notes sent to helpers outside. Even the most suspicious guards did not think to check the appliquéd pictures for messages, since sewing was seen as inconsequential women's work'

<http://www.thefolkartgallery.com/arpilleras.htm> (accessed 15.02.2012).

²⁵ Noël Carroll, interview with Ray Privett and James Kreul in Senses of Cinema.
<http://www.sensesofcinema.com/2001/13/carroll/> (accessed 30.10.2011).

1.1.2. Art and Politics: Can They Mix? Should They Mix?

When trying to answer the question of what should be considered political in art, two diametrically opposed approaches can be distinguished: one is the view discussed above (“all art is political”) and the other view holds that politics and art don’t mix (politics takes place in the political institutions and not in art and when it happens to mix them, we lose either the art part or the politics). There are many voices which find the mixture of art and politics problematic.

The first theoretical camp which considers the blending of art and politics problematic hold that by this mixture, usually, the political dimension is lost or at least diminished. They criticize the relationship between art and politics from a normative perspective (they don’t claim that art and politics are mutually exclusive). Even if art and politics can mix, they should not mix if the mixing is detrimental to the political. Why would be this mixture detrimental to the political? This mixture of art and politics is detrimental to the political when art and politics are blended just for achieving a successful artistic effect overlooking or deemphasizing the political purpose of that piece. Art’s engagement to the political, these theorists claim, is almost always a superficial one: “not even the most committed political art practice can, on its own, be a substitute for the simple act of being politically involved, as a citizen, organizer and activist” and, moreover, “there is no elegant fit between art and politics, no ideal meld of the two. What is needed for effective political activism relates to the needs of a living political movement... which most often does not call for something that is particularly aesthetically refined, just as what "works" best aesthetically in a gallery is not usually a slogan or a placard”.²⁶ In this understanding political art looks ridiculous when faced with the urgency of live political movements because it is “too aesthetic to be political”. Being “too aesthetic” means that the work is concerned too much with the business of aesthetics (pleasant form, good execution and so on) and the political part is just a mean to achieve this aesthetic end. The theorists from this camp don’t say ‘don’t mix politics with art’ or ‘don’t make political art in general’. They have a slightly different requirement, namely ‘don’t make superficially engaged political art because this art cannot be truly political’. In other words, they consider problematic only political art of certain stripe: the combination of art and politics made for the mainstream institutions of art (biennales and museum shows). In these situations, when art and politics are blended for attaining mostly a successful artistic effect, the political is deemphasized or even irrelevant.²⁷

²⁶ Ben Davis, What Good is Political Art in Times Like This in Artinfo (February 2011) <http://www.artinfo.com/news/story/37024/what-good-is-political-art-in-times-like-these/> (last accessed 1 May 2012).

The second theoretical camp is split into two parts: one holds that no genuine art is political (art and politics are mutually exclusive), while the other claims that no good art is political (art and politics can mix, but they should not mix). Before discussing what arguments underline these claims I will note that the first claim (“no art is political”) is no longer so popular (obviously, “Guernica”, “The Disasters of War”, “The Stonebreakers” are political artworks and it would be naïve to claim that these pieces are not art when they are universally appreciated as art works). Yet, for many conservative art theorists the combination of art and politics (even if it is possible) is detrimental to art. Let’s recall several points of view which criticize the combination between art and politics: “any work that intends to change opinions about political issues falls into the category of propaganda, which has a use, and by definition ceases to be art” (Edward Winkelman); “art is art-as-art and everything else is everything else” (Ad Reinhardt); “political commitment in our time means no art, no literature” (Robert Motherwell). Other contentions go in a similar direction: “If we understand a work of art in terms of the politics implicit in it, and sometimes quite explicit and transparent, we limit our understanding of it as art” (Donald Kuspit), “art should bypass politics and register a direct aesthetic appeal to the beholder” (Dave Hickey) and “art is an autonomous enterprise not to be reduced to the sum of its social and material circumstances...“Is ‘The Dinner Party’ art? Well, I suppose so. After all, what isn’t nowadays? But it is very bad art, it is failed art” (Hilton Kramer). Another example of the kind of rejection of the conjunction between art and politics is the following: the contemporary political artist Hans Haacke has received the following answer from Whitney Biennale regarding his submission: “This is not art, it is politics and therefore it shouldn’t be allowed here”.²⁸

²⁷ Ben Davis, What Good is Political Art in Times Like This in Artinfo (February 2011) <http://www.artinfo.com/news/story/37024/what-good-is-political-art-in-times-like-these/> (last accessed 1 May 2012).

All the above contentions, both “no art is political” and “art and politics don’t mix well and they should not mix”, seem to entail two things: (a) that art and politics are two separate realms, and (b) that art is an autonomous self-enclosing entity. “No art is political” view, conceives art as a completely closed monad which has no windows. Art is a self-enclosing entity with no relation to the reality outside of it. Art is its own purpose. Therefore, art cannot have another purpose (like political) yet still be art.

The philosophical origins of the idea of autonomy of art are found in Kant’s third critique where he was concerned with the autonomy of the aesthetic judgment. The aesthetic judgments are autonomous in that they do not rely or presuppose a concern with the object’s purpose, utility or even its actual existence. The idea of “autonomous art” appears during the late 18th century based on Kant’s considerations about the autonomy of the aesthetic judgment even if Kant’s main interest was not in art per se but in beauty (as an aesthetic judgement). He distinguished between free judgments of beauty which are conceptless and purposeless and dependent judgments of beauty which are not conceptless and purposeless and explicitly stated that art which is not just decorative is dependently beautiful and not freely beautiful.

²⁸ Chantal Mouffe, Rosalyn Deutsche, Branden W. Joseph, and Thomas Keenan, “Every Form of Art Has a Political Dimension”, Grey Room, No. 2, MIT Press, 2001, p. 100.

Anyway, the theorists of the autonomy of art (19th and 20th century) considered only what Kant said about the free aesthetic judgments (which are functionless and purposeless). They took Kant's concept of free beauty (the autonomous aesthetic judgment) as the origin of a theory about art's autonomy. But this is a mistake: we have to be aware that Kant's reference to the autonomy of aesthetic judgment of beauty is not the same thing as art's autonomy.

What does it mean for art to be autonomous? There is no one thing meant by the claim that art is autonomous and here I don't discuss all its senses.²⁹ "Autonomy" has been used in aesthetic theory in so many different ways, since Kant, that it is no longer clear what does it mean that "art is autonomous". For the purpose of this chapter I will investigate only one sense of art's autonomy: *the independence thesis*³⁰ – because those theorists who reject the mixing of art and politics usually rely on this thesis. The independence thesis is only one of the senses of the "art for art's sake".³¹ In a very general sense, autonomy of art is usually taken to mean that art is governed by its own laws and rules, and that artistic value makes no reference to social and political values. Another way of explaining art's autonomy is to say that art's practice does not serve any other practice (in this way art being an end in itself). To be autotelic³² art needs to be a separated sphere of activity from everyday life and its purpose should be the creation of something without a direct function or purpose. The art work's purpose is to have no other purpose than its own existence as such (it is an end in itself). The argument of "no art is political" is based on these grounds. In short, autotelic art is art that is

²⁹ I don't discuss here all the senses of the "autonomy of art" but I just mention the most popular: the aesthetic sense (the autonomy of the aesthetic judgment), the social autonomy of art (the artist is free from patronage, church or state), the autonomy of one art (for example, painting) from other arts, the autonomy of art in general from non-art.

³⁰ "Art is or ought to be divorced from life. Art has a life of its own (just as thought has) and develops purely on its own lines" (Oscar Wilde, The Decay of Lying, Lamb, 1909, p. 54).

³¹ There are various possible definitions for art for art's sake: (1) moderate aestheticism or separatism = the thesis of the separation of the value spheres (there is a concept of aesthetic value separated from moral and other values); (2) radical aestheticism = aesthetic value is superior to moral or other values (Nietzsche, Wilde); (3) contemplation thesis = the aesthetic is the domain of disinterested, distanced contemplation, involving a special attitude; (4) independence thesis = art is separated from life (for more on this issue, see Andy Hamilton, Adorno and the Autonomy of Art, <http://www.andyhamilton.org.uk/>).

³² The autotelism is a non-utilitarian theory of art holding that a work of art is an end in itself or its own justification (<http://www.thefreedictionary.com/autotelism>).

self-referential, functionless and purposeless. “No art is political” stresses that art is a self – enclosing entity which by its very nature does not refer to something external to its nature. This is a sense of autonomy which emphasizes the art itself and in itself.

The other autonomist claim (“art and politics can mix but they should not mix”) emphasizes the autonomy of the experience of art from the point of view of the subject who experiences art. “Art and politics can mix but they should not mix” concedes that art is not necessarily a separate realm, detached from social and political reality. I have quoted Hilton Kramer earlier claiming that “art so mired in the pieties of a political cause... fails to acquire any independent life of its own, as aesthetic art”³³. However, these theorists hold that art has to be appreciated as art in an autonomous way. So they don’t say that art has its own separate realm (and in this sense is “autonomous”), but our appreciation of art should be autonomous. That is the reason why art and politics can mix but they should not mix- the political from art ruins the aesthetic experience (I will develop more on this idea of aesthetic experience’s autonomy in the second chapter).

For the moment, I reject both autonomist claims (“no art is political” and “art and politics can mix but they should not mix”). The first claim (art and politics are mutually exclusive) is obviously unreasonable because, as I already stressed, to admit that art is art only when it is pure art (when it is only about itself and an end in itself) is to deny not only that “Guernica”, “The Disaster of War” and “Stonebreakers” are art but also all art which is about something or serves a purpose. If art has no other function, purpose or end (it is just an end in itself) then not even art which serves the purpose to afford aesthetic pleasure is not art. Therefore, by this token not only propagandistic pieces are not art but also landscape painting and naïve painting.

³³ Hilton Kramer, “Art: Judy Chicago’s Dinner Party Comes to Brooklyn Museum”, The New York Times, October 17, 1980.

The other autonomist stand “art and politics can mix but they should not mix” is also problematic because it assumes that the aesthetic experience of art is “autonomous” in the sense of a pure experience (that the eye is an innocent organ of perception) while our aesthetic experience as any other experience is never a cognitively uninfected perception and it is always determined by the viewer contextual background (which has also political, social, cultural components). The political significance of art does not deemphasize its aesthetic experience because the aesthetic experience comprises the whole framework in which the art work is situated and this framework includes the object’s background, the mode of production and the viewer’s background (the art object and the viewer’s conceptual, historical, social and political background).

Another way of understanding art’s autonomy is theorized by Adorno. The autonomy of art is not understood in terms of isolation from the social but in critical terms. For him art has a double character as both “autonomous and social fait [social fact]”.³⁴ This formulation seems paradoxical. He regards art aesthetically (as autonomous) and sociologically (as social fact) simultaneously. For him, this pair (aesthetic autonomy and social fact) is a dialectical pair where the two entities are interpenetrating. We could say that in his “Aesthetic Theory”, there are two inter-related senses of autonomy: social and aesthetic. The autonomous artwork is produced in a social situation and not in a vacuum (in this way being a social fact) but it has no direct social function (in this way being autonomous). Adorno’s understanding of art’s autonomy is a step further from the common view according to which art’s realm is separated from anything else but it still focuses on purposelessness of art as the core of its autonomy (in Adorno’s aesthetics, autonomous art has as its purpose the creation of something without direct function or purpose). Yet, what is interesting in Adorno’s approach of art’s autonomy is the fact that autonomous art is critical art (which in my approach is called political-critical art) without having a direct social or political function or purpose. Autonomous art is purposeless, functionless, is not socially useful but it is still critical. It is still critical in Adorno's sense because it criticizes the society by merely existing. It is precisely the refusal of social function which makes autonomous art to acquire in the end a critical dimension. For Adorno the autonomy of art is double-edged and in spite of the interpretations which consider his aesthetic an 'art for art's sake' theory, Adorno has a "theoretical adherence to the relation between art and society" (as his scholars put it) when he discusses art's autonomy. He does not demarcate the social realm from the aesthetic realm of art but just demarcates from the realm of autonomous art that art which has a direct political purpose or purpose. I assume that Adorno rejected art with a direct political function or purpose (or art which is socially useful) because he worries that this art would become a tool in the hands of the status quo (becoming Vulgäre Tendenzkunst, i.e. propaganda). That is the reason why he states in "Commitment" that "politics has migrated into autonomous art".³⁵ He wanted to say that only that art which does not have straightforward political purpose is politically autonomous. While I agree with his idea of autonomous art which criticizes the society, I don't think that art is critical (and autonomous) by merely existing and refusing a social function (to serve a purpose) because art still can be critical even if it has a political or a social direct function (for instance art can have the function to criticize the imposed hierarchies or values).

³⁴ Theodor Adorno, Aesthetic Theory, Athlone, London, 1997, p. 5.

Even if art and politics can mix, this does not mean that art is always mixed with politics. The blending of art and politics is just a momentarily one. When art and politics mix, this combination still can be called "autonomous". The momentarily overlapping of art and politics in political-critical art, persecuted as it is by the mainstream art-world, effectively overcomes the traditional aesthetic dichotomy between autotelic art and art which is politically concerned and it cannot accurately be called art. The temporary "concatenation between art and politics” (to use Gerald Raunig’s words), which in a certain way still preserves the autonomy³⁶ of both of them but it also allow them to work soundly together, opens the way for re-considering the traditional aesthetic categories and canons. Since we no longer speak about absolute field demarcations and art can overlap with politics without losing its relative separateness, we cannot be completely wrong if we attempt to re-tool the rigid and conventional cannons imposed by established aesthetic theories of art. The relation between art and politics is not a problematic one and there is no need to be concerned that one would deemphasize or annihilate the other if mixed.

³⁵ Theodor Adorno, "Commitment", in Andrew Arto and Eike Gebhardt (eds.), Essential Frankfurt School Reader, New York, 1982, pp. 300-319.

We can rescue the idea of art’s autonomy in such a manner that it would make the combination of art and politics unproblematic. Instead of thinking art’s autonomy in terms of separation between art-as-art and anything-else-as-anything-else a better path to follow is to understand autonomy in different terms. As Boris Groys stresses, “by criticizing socially, politically and culturally imposed hierarchies of values, art gains its autonomy and its resistance potential”.³⁷ In other words, the separateness of aesthetic concerns from political and social factors has been the mistaken way of understanding art’s autonomy. If art deals with politics or ethics is not less autonomous or less aesthetic. On the contrary, one of the main conditions for art to be considered critical and ‘political’ is to manifest varying degrees of both autonomy and opposition toward the status quo, including here the mainstream art-world with its official institutions. There is a ‘politics of autonomous art’ in the sense that art manifests its autonomy as resistance to hegemony and in this sense art and politics mix in an unproblematic way. Art’s autonomy is not understood in terms of purity, autotelism or isolation from other concerns (as in the conservative understanding of autonomy), but in critical terms. It is possible to retool the idea of art's autonomy not as a means of withdrawing once more in the world of pure aesthetic forms but instead as a model for subversion, critical intervention and political questioning. This autonomy entails that art's production and distribution can stand alone and can be self-sufficient from the power of those who rule the art-world. In this sense art can be both political and autonomous. Moreover, this autonomy of art makes possible the autonomous power of resistance (the political engagement). The art world, in the institutional sense, cannot be observed in any significant sense as autonomous, since it is regulated by many rules and aesthetic value judgments which reflect power structures and dominant social conventions. Still, art can break taboos and norms imposed from above, and become autonomous and political at the same time.

³⁶ In art’s case “autonomy” is just a relative autonomy. Excepting the case of formalist art where art can itself be treated as an autonomous “life of forms”, in any other case art is art as something else (so the autonomy is just a relative one). Even when art is abandoned for “real life”, it is still partly autonomous. Even in the cases when the art production as part of culture industry has only a relative autonomy, there is still something to be done about this autonomy (as fragile as it is).

³⁷ Boris Groys, The Power of Art, MIT Press, 2008, p. 16.

1.1.3. What is Political in Art?

I attempt now to identify what makes a work of art political. The label "political art" is in general applied to a wide variety of art productions, practices and activities. In the contemporary art-world there is great confusion concerning the question of what should be considered political art (partly because there is another great debate concerning the questions of what is political).³⁸ The term 'political art' is commonly used (in writings and theoretical discussions on art) as an umbrella term which accommodates arts which support and legitimize the status quo, arts which criticize and abhor it, as well as arts which merely portray a political event or situation without taking a stance (neither pro nor against).

For those who endorse the common definition of political art (art with a political message and content), this can be divided into three categories: endorsement, critique and portrayal. The first category supports and legitimates the political power of the moment (some art styles or movements seem to fit better in this category than others: Socialist Realism, Advertisement Art and to some extent Pop Art).³⁹

³⁸ This confusion is due in part to the ongoing debate concerning the question of what is political. The 20th century witnessed a proliferation of interpretations regarding the concept of "politics", among which one could find the inclusion of the private sphere ("the personal is political") and other phenomena circumscribed by expressions like "identity politics", "social work's politics", "cultural politics", etc.

The second category critiques and negates the status quo of the moment (political, economic, or artistic status quo) and attempts to make visible the injustices what the dominant structures of power tend to obscure (here too, some art movements seem to fit better in this category than others: Dada, Conceptual Art, Neue Sachlichkeit, Realism, Social Realism, Performance Art (but also many instances of ‘Outsider’ art and Art Brut). Finally, the third category covers art that does not necessarily support or critique the status quo but only portrays power relations (like Historical Painting). Artists from this category merely record or chronicle the events without taking a stance. The fact that some art styles and movements fit better than others in one category or another does not mean that exceptions cannot be found. Political art does not belong to any particular specific style or genre and it does not employ any particular specific technique and medium. Political art pieces can range from Rococo to Conceptual Art and from classical portraits to contemporary multimedia art.

Although all three categories are generally considered instances of political art, only the “critique” category highlights the antagonistic dimension of the political and thus deserves the label “political art” in the sense at issue here. Art is often produced in a network of power relations and only affirms that relations of power. Is such art then accurately called “political”? The answer to this question depends on what understanding of the political we employ. The political can be defined as something having to do with “social relationships involving authority or power”.⁴⁰ This understanding of “the political” is certainly correct (political is the expression of power relations and hegemony) but it is incomplete. The hegemony part of the definition of the political has to be coupled with the antagonistic or counter-hegemonic struggle if we are to fruitfully account for what is political in the sense intended here. In other words, as Chantal Mouffe and Ernesto Laclau argue, there are two key concepts involved in the political: hegemony and antagonism. By hegemony they mean “the process by which the views, values or interests of a section of society come to dominate society as a whole by occupying the place of the official, accepted, authorized and legitimated thought”⁴¹ and “antagonism” comes to mean “a we/they relation between enemies who want to destroy each other”; Mouffe adds that “a properly political intervention (antagonistic) is always one that engages with a certain aspect of the existing hegemony in order to disarticulate/re-articulate its constitutive elements. It can never be merely oppositional or conceived as desertion because it aims at re-articulating the situation in a new configuration”.⁴² In other words, she is saying that in a properly political intervention, it is not enough to negate or to criticize hegemony. My understanding of the political is inspired by Mouffe’s, but also differs from hers in certain respects. I would define the political as the totality of the relations of power and authority in society, all of which can be questioned by counter-hegemonic interventions. Every hegemonic order is susceptible of being challenged by counter-hegemonic practices which attempt to challenge and destabilize it.

³⁹ Beside its critique of Fine Arts art of the past, Pop Art supports consumerism and advertisement industry.

⁴⁰ Available from: <http://www.thefreedictionary.com/political>.

Like Mouffe, I believe that the concept of the political incorporates both the idea of power (hegemony) and antagonism (resistance and denial of hegemony). It cannot be accurately defined if we don’t take into account its antagonistic (critical, anti-hegemonic) dimension.

Unlike her, I don’t endorse the view that a new configuration of power has to be “re-articulated” to replace the old one. I don’t think that the counter-hegemonic practices (inherent in the political) which attempt to disarticulate power have to necessarily install another form of hegemony. Once a counter-hegemonic intervention is transformed into a new form of power becomes part of the establishment.

⁴¹ Chantal Mouffe, “Artistic Activism and Agonistic Spaces”, Art and Research, Vol. 1, No. 2, Summer, 2007, source: <http://www.artandresearch.org.uk/v1n2/mouffe.html> (last accessed 17 May 2013).

⁴² Chantal Mouffe, On The Political, Routledge, London-New York, 2005, p. 16.

If we follow Mouffe's path, then we replace a form of hegemony with another and the focus in understanding the political will be on the hegemony rather than on antagonism-when in fact both of them equally count in the understanding of the political. This does not mean that critical art cannot question the hegemony from within. The thing is that this not the only acceptable and effective strategy (as Mouffe has argued). For example, those artists who self-consciously choose to work on the margins and in opposition with the mainstream globalized art world perform their "politics of invisibility" and exodus from the hegemonic institutions. Their choice to withdraw is informed by reasons of social, economic, and political critique: "by grasping the politics of their own invisibility and marginalization they inevitably challenge the formation of normative artistic values".⁴³ My problem with Mouffe's account is not that hegemony cannot be questioned from within (obviously it can), but with her two further claims that: (a) critical art as simply a manifestation of refusal or negation of power is not a properly political intervention ("Too much emphasis on dis-identification happens at the expense of re-identification, i.e. we don't only need a critique of what exists, trapped within a deterministic framework, but also a re-imagining of what is possible")⁴⁴, and (b) "Every hegemonic order is susceptible of being challenged by counter-hegemonic practices i.e. practices which will attempt to disarticulate the existing order so as to install another form of hegemony".⁴⁵

I would define political art as art that deliberately sets out to oppose by criticism the hegemony. This critique can function both as a withdrawal and disengagement from power and as an involvement with a certain aspect of the existing hegemony (in order to destabilize that hegemony). I don't prioritize, like Mouffe, the second form of critique over the first. The reason I don't prioritize the second form of critique over the first one, is because many times the outsider artists who are not involved in the mainstream institutions of power, challenge the hegemony by refusing to be part of it. In this way they manage to make the others aware of the mechanisms of domination present within these institutions of power without necessarily wanting to replace the hegemonic power with another power. For example, the dissident artists of the totalitarian regimes have criticized the power with their political art without being part of power's institutions and without criticizing a point of view in favor of another. For example the dissident artists from the former URSS (Gennady Donskoy, Viktor Skersis and Mikhail Roshal) criticized the communist power of the moment by performing a burial. The artists were buried in the ground and spoke into a microphone about their condition as artists in the communist USSR. When they eventually came out from the hole, they started to ask: 'Where is Chris Burden when we need him?' What I want to illustrate with this example is that political art does not criticize a perspective (in this case communist hegemony) in favor of another perspective – which is “better” or it would be a candidate for a new hegemony to replace the criticized one. When the Russian dissident artists ask 'Where is Chris Burden when we need him?' their critique is not just meant to challenge the communist URSS hegemony and its official art and to contrast it with the free art of the West. Their critique is directed at the heart of any hegemony (the Western art world included).

⁴³ Gregory Sholette, Dark Matter: Art and Politics in the Age of Enterprise Culture, London, Pluto Press, 2011, p. 4.

⁴⁴ Chantal Mouffe, "Artistic Activism and Agonistic Spaces", Art and Research, Vol. 1, No. 2, Summer 2007 .

⁴⁵ Chantal Mouffe, On The Political, Routledge, London-New York, 2005, p. 18.

This way of understanding political art does not put emphasis on art's “political message and content” (as in the common definition of political art) but on “critical intervention”. To critically intervene in power relations does not mean to merely reflect on these relations (either being affirmative of the relations of power in which art is produced or merely portraying these relations). I have to add that the common definition of political art is problematic not only because misconstrues the understanding of “the political” but also because situates it within art's content only. I will argue in the second chapter that the critical intervention can be the organizing principle of the political art in all its aspects: not only its content but also its form and its modes of production and dissemination. At this point, I just have to stress that art's content/message is just one element which can count as political but not the only one. Just to briefly take an individual example, I would mention political music: the elements that are in fact political in some musical pieces range from lyrics (content), to rhythm, sounds, and performance.

To detect to what extent a piece of art is political or non-political we need a good knowledge of its general context (larger than the art historical one). For instance, we cannot suitably claim that some of Picasso's art, dealing with the Spanish Civil War is political if we have only a limited knowledge of the Spanish Civil War, of Picasso's stylistic and personal history and so on. The context described in Art History books is not always enough because many times political power manipulates the discipline of Art History, and the art that survives from the past epochs is whatever the authorities permitted to be preserved in museums and archives (like in the authoritarian regimes). The "political" dimension of an art piece depends on the context in which it is performed, exhibited or listened to. For example, some music of an ethnic minority that is listened to solely for entertainment purposes in the country of origin becomes a tool for the identification and protest of ethnic groups against the interests of the dominant groups from the country of settlement.⁴⁶ This example shows that the same art piece can be seen both as a form of political expression (when the power relations are at stake) and as a form of entertainment (when the power relations are not at stake the same piece of music is just a piece of non-political entertainment).

⁴⁶ Salsa music, rap music and others examples of political music are discussed at large in Marco Martineello and Jean-Michel Lafleur, "Ethnic Minorities' Cultural and Artistic Practices as Forms of Political Expression: A Review of the Literature and a Theoretical Discussion on Music", Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, Vol. 34, No. 8, November 2008, pp. 1191-1217.

1.2. Propaganda Art vs. Political -Critical Art: In Totalitarian Regimes and in Liberal Democracies⁴⁷

Until this point I have attempted to clarify what makes art political. As stated at the beginning, the second aim of this chapter is to distinguish political-critical art from propaganda art. I have suggested that propaganda art is political only in a deficient and minimal sense and it would be a mistake to think that critical art (counter-hegemonic art) and propaganda art are equally “political” (in the same sense and to the same degree). In what follows, I attempt to explain the differences between the political in critical art and the political in propaganda art.

For the sake of clarity, I propose to address the question of “the political” in propaganda art and in critical art in a comparative perspective: in totalitarianism and in liberal democracies. Why this comparison? First of all, this comparison allows me to address the question of the political in art in two antithetical political regimes: from a political regime where (almost) all art were submitted to the ideological and institutional control (all art was expected to be “political”), to a regime of liberalization of art (where theoretically there is no official requirement for art to be politically concerned). Tackling the issue of what is political in art comparatively (in totalitarianism and in liberal democracies) is unavoidable for my approach for several reasons which I will discuss at large below. I have to mention that art which is politically concerned has not appeared only or first in the 20th century’s totalitarianism; actually it existed a long time before these political regimes and, has not stopped after their fall either. The reason why both art theorists and political scientists refer firstly to the totalitarian regimes when they address the question of what is political in art is twofold: (1) from a strict academic perspective, “politics and the arts” studies has developed as a subfield of political science only since 1980s onwards, and (2) the idea of propaganda is usually associated with totalitarian regimes, especially when we focus on the art production of those regimes. It is stated that the propaganda machine of totalitarian regimes used all cultural production (including all arts) for its purposes (to promote and legitimize the status quo). Totalitarian regimes emphasized the political importance of propaganda art to such an important degree that it became the only officially accepted art of those regimes.

⁴⁷ A larger and slightly different version of this section has been detailed in my study, Maria Alina Asavei, “A Theoretical Excursus on the Concept of Political Art in Communism and its Aftermath”, in Romanian Political Science Journal, vol. XI, no. 4, Bucharest, 2011, pp. 647-660.

The theorists of political art usually disagree on whether political art can be truly political in totalitarian regimes as well as in liberal democracies. One group of contemporary philosophers (like Boris Groys and Jean Baudrillard) claim that the art of liberal democracies is predominantly a “spectacle” commodity and it cannot accomplish a substantial critique of the mechanisms of power which produced it and distributed it. Therefore, for these theorists, any form of political art created under (neo) liberal capitalist democracies of Western world (as the one that only confirms that condition) cannot be truly political. Groys explicitly states that “Art becomes politically significant only when it is made beyond or outside the art market –like propaganda art”.⁴⁸ By stating this, Groys explicitly admits that especially propaganda art of communist regimes is “truly” political, if it is compared to any political art produced in liberal democracies, because the propaganda art of communist regimes has been produced outside the art market (it has been produced outside the art market because it was no art market under communist rule).

The second group of theorists claim that, on the contrary, only art produced in liberal democracies can be truly political (critical of the mechanisms of power), while the art of totalitarian regimes has been just plain propaganda for the unique party because at that time, the unique party neutralized any form of critique. Finally the third group claims that only dissident art in totalitarian regimes produced beyond or outside the political power is accurately political because only that art has been critical of the regime's propaganda machine (with the risk of being forbidden and censored). They claim that in liberal democracy art cannot be truly political anymore (critical art) because the critique is always tamed and assimilated by the cultural status quo. Every form of artistic dissent is institutionalized by the hegemonic art world and the critical aspect, in this way, vanishes.

⁴⁸ Boris Groys, Art Power, Cambridge, MIT Press, 2008, pp. 5-7.

1.2.1. Propaganda Art vs. Political Critical Art in Totalitarian Regimes

Propaganda is usually defined as “the information, especially of a biased or misleading nature, used to promote a political cause or point of view” (Oxford Dictionary)⁴⁹. Yet, my research is concerned with political art and not with non-art propaganda. Propaganda art is a political art in the sense that it is concerned with politics and it has a political message. However, typically its message usually promotes the hegemony of the moment or critiques whatever that hegemony wants to be criticized. There are many guises in which propaganda art may appear but I don't discuss them here. Some argue, for instance that art created in opposition to ruling ideas and values of hegemony may also fall under the rubric of propaganda. I agree to some extent with this claim. When does art become propaganda? Art becomes propaganda not necessarily when artists work on behalf of hegemony or in opposition to it but when it leaves no room for a deliberative stance in the viewer (when it leaves no room for genuine political participation and deliberation). Anyway, although I admit that sometimes, it may happen that art created in opposition to hegemony to fall under the label of propaganda (if that piece of art wants to impose a certain view without leaving room for deliberation and interpretation), typically art which opposes the hegemony has a certain flexibility in its meaning. To put it shortly, propaganda art is simply vulgäre ⁴⁹ Oxford Dictionary: <http://oxforddictionaries.com/definition/english/propaganda> (last accessed 13 June 2013).

Tendenzkunst ('vulgar tendentious art') and doesn't leave the possibility for flexibility in its appreciation and understanding. In totalitarianism, propaganda art does not leave room either in the production or in the reception because its politics, commitments and meanings have been imposed from above and controlled from above. Its politics is an enforced politics in which the deliberative stance of the artist/audience is totally disregarded.

At the level of common thinking, many people tend to consider only propaganda art "political" (especially people from the former communist countries but not only them). Not only have those from the art business (artists, curators, art critics) but also the untrained art public tended to consider only the first defective and minimal sense of "political art" ("political art is art with political message and content"). In order to understand what is the meaning given commonly to "political art" by those that lived under the communist regimes I have carried out a small experiment. I have asked Eastern European⁵⁰ citizens: what does "political art" stand for? I have to acknowledge that this question has been addressed to people who are not really connoisseurs in art business, in the sense that they don't have a professional interest in art. The (almost) unanimous answer was that political art was the propaganda art of communist and Nazi regimes, art that depicted happy miners, peasants and, of course, more often, the leader as a national hero and as a charismatic leader. For the next question: "Why is this art political?" most of the answers said that "official" art (propaganda art) is political because it served the party or the political power and because its message was political. They added that they do not like that type of art because it is not "true art" but a lie and that they have never seen under communism any art work that criticized the regime. And they were right about this, because during the communist regimes "critical" art was practically invisible. No art gallery or art magazine would distribute that forbidden art. The officialdom barely knew about its existence and when they knew, they destroyed or censored the piece and imprisoned the artist. I have introduced the examples above in order to illustrate the unidirectional understanding of political art among the non-professional art public from former communist regimes.

⁵⁰ The intention of this research is to make neither a cross-country comparison regarding East European citizens' understanding of political art, nor a specific case study. The goal is to critically discuss the normative implications of the commonly held view of political art as the official art of the communist regime.

They don't find the concept of "political art" a contradiction in terms (as some art critics and theorists, who claim that art and politics cannot mix) because they don't struggle for a definition (either for art or for politics). They understand political art as that art which is complicitous with hegemony because this was the way people have grasped the "political" in art in totalitarian regimes. Political art was considered to be exclusively official art, produced under the pressure of the political regime of the moment and which was meant only to reinforce and that power. Another important point is that the communist power required that only the content of all art to be political. They did not emphasize any specific demands regarding the form. In other words, art can have any form or style, as long as the content was "political".

In what follows I will argue, contrary to common opinion, that the official art of totalitarian regimes is political only in a deficient sense, precisely because of its forcefully committed stance, while the unofficial art, mainly opposition-critical art, is truthfully political in the robust sense precisely because of its non-imposed commitment. Socialist Realism has been the official canon of art in communist regimes. Socialist Realism required that all arts perform a political function, and for this reason Socialist Realist art has been labelled the eminently political art. The communist ideologues used the formula "political art" in order to denote "Socialist Realism", the official canon of all art adopted in the Soviet Union and in its satellites starting with 1930. In this view, Socialist Realism has been the only "political art". The ideologues of Socialist Realism did not see the unofficial art as political (the "unofficial" art is understood in this context both as art that was directly confrontational to the regime and its art canon, and purely aesthetic art).

These art practices of opposition and critique of the status quo were considered by the regime as “degenerate” art practices but not as “political”. For example, in the former Soviet Union, party’s officials condemned the writings of the satirist Mikhail Zoshchenko, accused of writing “degenerate and vulgar parodies on Soviet life”. They also censured the poetess Anna Akhmatova, who was charged with writing “empty and non-political poetry”.⁵¹ Creating “non-political” art was seen by the communist party as the artist’s big fault, as a “devil-may-care attitude” and “ideological indifference”. The artist’s duty was to disseminate the communist values and to create a political art: “artists think that politics is the business of the government and the Central Committee (...) We demand that our comrades both as leaders in literary affairs and writers, be guided by the vital force of the Soviet order – its politics”.⁵² As these examples show, political art has been identified exclusively with propaganda art. Maybe this is one of the reasons why, long after the fall of communism, at the level of common thinking, in the former communist countries, political art is still understood only as the official/propaganda art of the communist regimes.

In spite of this requirement, many works of art produced during dictatorship did not respect the canon imposed by the status quo without being critical in an overt sense. The communist party disapproved even of these productions because their appeal to masses was negligible and because they were not “political” enough. Being “not political enough” meant for communist hegemony “not having a political message or content”. In a nutshell, political art is reduced to a source of ideological information (propaganda) and the artists are reduced to a “singleness of aspirations, singleness of ideas, and singleness of aim”.⁵³

Nonetheless, Igor Golomstock is right when he argues that not everything created in the art field under a totalitarian regime could be explained through a single party’s monopoly.⁵⁴ Not all art works that have been created during totalitarianism can be defined as official, propaganda art. In the case of communist art, “autonomous” productions have been a political strategy by which artists differentiated themselves from their contemporary field of cultural politics. “Autonomous” art in a totalitarian political regime means in my approach that art which criticized and opposed propaganda art and the politics which underlines it, in this way preserving its critical and political autonomy.

⁵¹ Ann Demaitre, “The Great Debate on Socialist Realism”, The Modern Language Journal, Vol. 50, No. 5 (May, 1966), p. 265.

⁵² Literaturnaia Gazeta, September 21, 1946, p. 83 (my translation from Russian).

⁵³ Karl Radek, “Contemporary World Literature and the Tasks of Proletarian Art”, in Problems of Soviet Literature, Vol. 35, New York, 1948, p. 9.

Thus, unofficial, critical works of art manifested their politics through various strategies of opposition: from the overtly anti-hegemony critique to the ways in which they indirectly opposed the official canon of art production, interpretation and distribution. Unlike propaganda art, critical art of communist regimes is not political only in an overt sense but it appeals to the viewer as a political being in possession of the faculties needed for a genuine political deliberation. Both propaganda art and critical art are committed to the political reflection on reality but their commitment is different. The commitment to create a critical art piece remains politically polyvalent, while propaganda’s politics has no flexibility. As Williams posits, an artistic commitment at its best, means to take social reality and the political reality as the focus of the artwork and “then to find some of the hundred ways in which all these aspects can be approached”⁵⁵. At its worst, it could be an imposed commitment which merely focuses on what the hegemony of the moment demands. By the same token Adorno claims that politically motivated commitment in arts “remains politically polyvalent as long as it is not reduced to propaganda”.⁵⁶ Propaganda art’s imposed committed stance leaves no room for deliberative thinking, for debate and no room for what the work may say because the meaning is imposed from above.

⁵⁴ Igor Golomstock, Totalitarian Art in the Soviet Union, the Third Reich, Fascist Italy and the People’s Republic of China, Collins Harvill, London, 1991.

⁵⁵ Raymond Williams, “The Writer: Commitment and Alignment” in Marxism Today, source: http://www.amielandmelburn.org.uk/collections/mt/pdf/80_06_22.pdf (last accessed: 5 August 2013).

⁵⁶ Theodor Adorno, “Commitment”, in Essential Frankfurt School Reader, Andrew Arto and Eike Gebhardt (eds.), New York: Continuum, 1982, pp. 300-319.

1.2.2. Political-Critical Art in Liberal Democracies

Political-critical art of both totalitarianism and liberal democratic regimes is a counter-hegemonic intervention which typically unsettles the status quo. Many times, critical art is censored in both regimes. Not only totalitarian regimes have censored critical art but also the liberal democratic ones. For example, Botero's series of Abu Gahraib paintings have been banned in most parts of the United States; the mayor of New York City, Rudolf Giuliani disapproved of critical art being shown in the Brooklyn Museum and so on.

Contemporary political artists from liberal democratic regimes strive to question the neo-liberal hegemony exactly as the oppositional artists of totalitarian regimes have questioned the Nazi and Communist authority (in spite of so many voices claiming that art has lost its critical power after the fall of totalitarianism, because any form of critique is automatically neutralized by the capitalist system). Marco Martiniello and Jean-Michel Lafleur hold, for example, that political – critical music loses its political stance once it enters the complex system of the music industry. Once the music enters the capitalist market it becomes a product that is produced, circulated, exchanged and censored. There is always a struggle for some political music between remaining partly a form of protest music and becoming a mainstream genre, removing any controversial lyrics in order to broaden the audience. Boris Groys also argues that the only way for art to become political under liberal democracy is to become critical (“which means that it tries to reflect explicitly on its own-character-as-commodity”).⁵⁷ By the same token, he argues that Islamist videos and posters functioning in the context of the international anti-globalist movement are political creations made outside the dominating art market, and which are overlooked by the institutions of the art market because this art is not a commodity.⁵⁸ But I don't think that not being a commodity is a necessary condition for art to be truly political. In some contexts even the commodified art pieces preserve their critical value. For instance, Rap music which deals with problems of discrimination, poverty and violence may remain in some contexts a powerful tool for Afro-Americans to express their anxiety and critique against status quo even though sometimes it is mass commercialized through MTV and other channels of consumerism.⁵⁹

⁵⁷ Boris Groys, “Art after Communism”, available from: <http://www.unitednationsplaza.org/event/22/> (last accessed 7 May 2012).

Nonetheless, political art from both totalitarian regimes and liberal democracies has several elements in common but this does not mean that relevant differences cannot be discerned. While the political art of the totalitarian regimes manifested its critique of hegemony mostly as withdrawal, remaining mainly outside official art institutions (being mostly an apartment-underground art type), in liberal democracies critical-political art tends to be institutionalized and, in this way, its political stance is sometimes neutralized. It is not uncommon (among neo-Marxists) to hold the view that capitalism can mobilize to transform any critique into a form of commodity that thereby neutralizes that critique. There are many examples of critical art which have been de-politicized once they have become part of the culture industry.⁶⁰ A very interesting phenomenon, known as the "institutionalization of dissent", started in the 80's: critical art is gentrified by the mainstream culture and by its institutions. What at the beginning was intended to be "critical" to hegemony suddenly becomes a new "mainstream". This is not such a big surprise since the "enemy" looks familiar, being the hand that feeds the contemporary political artists. As Lucy Lippard honestly puts it, “we were picketing the people we drank with and lived off. We were making art in a buyer’s market but not a consumer’s market. We were full of ‘mixed feelings’, because we wanted to be considered workers as everyone else and at the same time we were not happy when we saw our products being treated like everyone else’s, because deep down we know as artists we are special”.⁶¹

⁵⁸ Boris Groys, Art Power, Cambridge, MIT Press, 2008, p. 9.

⁵⁹ For more details about the way in which rap groups accept to soften their message for reaching a global audience as an effect of commercialization (while remaining at the same time opposition artists), see T. Rose, Black Noise. Rap Music and Black Culture in Contemporary America, Middletown: Wesleyan University Press, 1994.

⁶⁰ An example is Rai music in France. This music developed in Algeria as a combination of rural and urban culture music. It is considered to have been talking about difficult social issues like poverty, marginal life and so on. From 1979 onwards Rai has been struggling between remaining a form of protest music and becoming a mainstream genre, removing any controversial lyrics in order to broaden the audience (Marco Martineello and Jean-Michel Lafleur, "Ethnic Minorities' Cultural and Artistic Practices as Forms of Political Expression: A Review of the Literature and a Theoretical Discussion on Music", Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, Vol. 34, No. 8, November 2008, p. 1202).

In spite of this tendency, there is still room for true dissent even if these “gifts of resistance” are not always visible because of their marginality. Political-critical art of liberal democratic regimes continues to co-exist with the art of a globalized mainstream art world which is fully developed providing distribution systems which integrate artists into the global market. But if an established distribution system rejects what it considers to be “inconvenient” art pieces, it will always be possible to organize a Salon des Refusés more or less fully developed in providing distribution. In other words, artists can choose various distribution systems, not necessarily the mainstream galleries or art magazines, which serve them best or constrain them least. In liberal democracies, political art does not cease to be oppositional and critical.

⁶¹ Lucy Lippard, “Trojan Horses: Activist Art and Power”, in Sally Everett (ed.), Art Theory and Criticism, McFarland Company, Inc., Publishers, 1983, p. 191.

1.3. Conclusions

I have to stress that for some contemporary artists and art theorists “political art” is a tedious term which has to go away. Anja Kirschner and David Panos pointed out that these days the term “political art” operates “to obscure competing notions of the ‘political’, replacing potential antagonisms with the self congratulatory assumption that all ‘political’ art shares a liberal/progressive and ultimately compatible perspective”.⁶² For me it is clear that this term makes no sense for many people because of at least three reasons: (1) the frequently heard assertion that “all art is political”; (2) the conception that art is political when it deals with political issues, without distinguishing if this “dealing with political issues” is in a critical manner or not; and (3) the misconception that politics has to do with legitimizing power over something. Instead of giving up the term ‘political art’ (as Anja Kirschner and David Panos suggest) it would be more useful and productive to better analyze it. To this end, in this chapter I have attempted to conceptually clarify the meaning of “political art”. I have rejected the common sense understanding of political art as “art with a political message and content” on the grounds that it fails to acknowledge the fact that political art is not exclusively a matter of content or message; it assumes falsely that political art must be political in an overt sense and, it fails to distinguish political art that is propaganda from political art that is not propaganda. I have suggested that political art, in its narrow and non-deficient sense, is that art that deliberately sets out to critically intervene in power relations by challenging the imposed hierarchies and values (cultural, economic or social). This understanding of political art allows us to distinguish between works of art which are political only in a lax and deficient sense from works of art which are not merely dealing with a political topic or confirm the hegemony but critically resist the status quo. The later are robustly political.

⁶² Anja Kirschner and David Panos, interview published in Frieze, “Art and politics - A Survey (part 2)”, 12 September 2012, source: <http://blog.frieze.com/art-and-politics-a-survey-part-2/> (last accessed: 7 July 2013).

There are nonetheless distinctive ways of framing the meaning of political art and these conceptual demarcations are nevertheless important for understanding the ways in which the public engages with political art because the political involved in propaganda art of Socialist Realism is not the same with the politics of Fernando Botero's "Abu Ghraib". The fact that we customarily call them both 'political' pieces of art does not mean that they both are political to the same degree and in the same way. The way in which art is political determines both its appreciation as art and its effectiveness. Art which is called "political" but only restates the dominating hegemony of the moment is political only in a lax and deficient sense because its politics circumvents the spectator's political deliberation. If it circumvents reflection then it works like a hammer (in a didactic manner) and becomes ineffective both politically and artistically (being boring). My proposal of considering the different ways of framing the meaning of political art is meant to help us in distinguishing the degrees of politicality in a piece of art. That does not mean that what people call "political" always will coincide with the conditions of my definition. I concede that in some cases one person's propaganda art will be another person's critical art. There is room for disagreement on this issue because it cannot be settled in advance for who is art political in a critical sense and for whom is propaganda art. Here, I have merely set out the principle.

CHAPTER 2. POLITICAL-CRITICAL ART AND THE AESTHETIC

In this chapter, I argue for an understanding of the aesthetic which goes beyond a certain, purist⁶³ understanding of it, hoping to provide a sound mode of joining the aesthetic and political-critical art, in spite of all discontent regarding their compatibility. As a preliminary remark, I point out for the sake of clarity, that the conception of the aesthetic I will sustain goes beyond a purist aesthetic approach to art which was very popular in the 20th century (Aesthetic Modernism). I will show later on that many vestiges of it are found in contemporary art theory and aesthetics.

Many theorists hold that there is a gap⁶⁴ between political-critical art and the aesthetic. Why does there appear to be a gap between them?

On the one hand, political-critical art is a confrontational art, dealing with problems of injustice or abuses of power. Its purpose is to increase the awareness about the mechanisms of domination in society by criticizing those mechanisms. On the other hand, the aesthetic has been customarily understood as something affording a pleasurable experience (of a special kind) which happens to us when we perceive the surface/form of art works or natural kinds. Political art, these critics claim, does not operate primarily via the aesthetic: it is not a pleasing art because its purpose is not to afford us an aesthetic experience but to make us conscious of society's problems. For attaining this purpose, political art looks unappealing, shocking or repellent (and even when it looks attractive its attractiveness is separate from its political content). They conclude that political art does not have an aesthetic purpose and this makes it a lesser art (bad art) or at least a non-aesthetic instance of art.

⁶³ Basically, I argue against the formalist aestheticians from classical/modernist traditions (Bell, Fry, Hanslick, Gurney, Greenberg, Fried, Prall), against contemporary aestheticians (especially Zangwill and Beardsley) and also against attitude theorists (Stolnitz and Dawson).

⁶⁴ This "gap" should be understood here not as "mutual exclusiveness" but rather as discrepancy between the two figures (the aesthetic and political art).

On the other hand, another theoretical position also holds that there is a gap between political-critical art and the aesthetic, but for different reasons than those sketched above. This theoretical position holds that the aesthetic is an “ideological construct” (Terry Eagleton, Paul de Man, and Pierre Bourdieu among many others) or an instrument of “evasion” (Raymond Williams) which usually supports and popularizes the values of the status quo (cultural elites). The argument which underlines this claim goes like this: the real function of the aesthetic is that of an ideology. This ideology imposes what is good art and good taste and assumes an alienating division of human labor distinguishing between art (aesthetic, superior, pure) and craft (non-aesthetic, inferior). From this perspective the concept of the aesthetic does not go well with counter-hegemonic critical art (because this art is not aesthetic).

Against both types of critics, I will argue that political-critical art need not be evaluated in accordance with the notion of the aesthetic they are employing. It seems that both categories of critics conflate the concept of the aesthetic with a purist aesthetic approach to art. However, as I will argue below in this chapter, the aesthetic designates one thing and a purist aesthetic designates another. Both categories of critics fail to make this distinction. The consequence of this conflation of the aesthetic with the pure aesthetic approach to art, led to a rejection of the aesthetic tout court from contemporary art discourse and theory in general. The present day rejection of the aesthetic (Eagleton, de Man, Williams, Schödlbauer) has to do (among other things) with a recurrent identification of the aesthetic with a particular and influential historical version of it, namely, the purist version of the aesthetic. According to this version: the piece of art x is “aesthetic” if: (a) it affords an aesthetic experience (based on an affect-oriented apprehending of art) (b) the aesthetic purpose of art is its only purpose (or the primary purpose), and (c) art appreciation is defined as a response to purely formal qualities – line, shape, space, texture, light, and colour (where “form” refers to the visible/perceivable elements of a piece, independent of their meaning”).⁶⁵ Responsible for the popularity of this understanding of the aesthetic are the formalist aestheticians, both from the modernist formalist tradition (Bell, Fry, Hanslick, Gurney, Greenberg, Fried, Prall); contemporary formalist aestheticians (especially Zangwill, Beardsley and Curtain) and the so-called attitude theories (Stolnitz and Bullough). This theoretical perspective (the pure aesthetic approach to art) is erroneously considered by many theorists “the aesthetic paradigm of art” (betrayed also by the 20th century Avant-Garde). My position is that this version of the aesthetic is, indeed, exclusionary and narrow and needs to be rejected. It is exclusionary because many art pieces which do not afford us a pleasure of a certain kind, would not be credited with aesthetic potential and would be considered inferior/bad (“aesthetically meretricious” art) or non-art. This understanding of the aesthetic emphasizes a raw/immediate “sensitivity” as opposed to “conceptual-dependent aesthetic understanding” of art (where the art piece is experienced as part of a certain context or history and with a certain awareness of the fact that it is art).⁶⁶ In this chapter I will argue for the later and against the former.

One final disclaimer: I have to acknowledge from the beginning that I am not criticizing the entire aesthetic tradition but only a part of it (purist aesthetic approaches of art). I will take issue with those theories (both traditional and contemporary) which take the concept of the aesthetic (or some allied concept like the formal) as essentially perceptual or formal (a cognitively non-inflicted perception).

What I hope to demonstrate in this chapter is a revision and an enlargement of the understanding of the aesthetic which will accommodate political-critical art. Before putting forth my arguments, it has to be firstly explained what counts as the aesthetic. We have been accustomed to rely more upon a sense of the aesthetic as established by a certain version of the philosophical aesthetic tradition. According to this tradition, the sensuous is central to the idea of the aesthetic.⁶⁷ Another tenet we are familiar with, closely connected with the (purist) concept of the aesthetic, is that form of an object is paramount to its aesthetic appreciation. On this view, form would be seen as the depoliticized structure of art while content is the aesthetically devaluated counter-part of it. I attempt to circumvent the dichotomy between political content (seen as non-aesthetic art) and pure (or aesthetic) form. I want to argue that the political can find expression through formal, aesthetic means too.

⁶⁵ This definition of ‘form’ can be consulted in: http://arthistory.about.com/cs/glossaries/g/f_form.htm (last accessed: 5 August 2013).

⁶⁶ The contemporary aesthetician Nick Zangwill argues: “A moderate formalism joins forces with extreme formalism in complaining vociferously that anti-formalism misses out on an important point of our aesthetic lives, in which our aesthetic thought and experience is independent of our knowledge of a thing’s history and context” (Nick Zangwill, “In Defense of Extreme Formalism about Inorganic Nature”, British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 45, No. 2, April, 2005, p. 186).

In order to defend this position, I have to firstly explain what counts as the aesthetic. In the first section of this chapter, I will focus on the concept of the aesthetic attempting to highlight its traditional meanings. In the second section I will discuss the two categories of critics of the mixing of political-critical art and the aesthetic who find that there is a gap (an incompatibility) between the aesthetic and political art. The first group finds political art as detrimental to the aesthetic and the second finds the aesthetic as detrimental to the political. The need for a revised understanding of the aesthetic according to which non-perceptual properties of art are still aesthetic properties will be the focus of the third section. It is quite clear that “the aesthetic” has recently undergone substantial redefinition and enlargement (after the Brillo Boxes). This enlargement of the concept of the aesthetic (for example, as envisaged by James Shelley) accommodates political, conceptual and radical art. By accepting non-perceptual properties as aesthetic properties in art appreciation and experiencing, the gap between political art and the aesthetic can be overcome. Section four also argues for bridging the gap between the aesthetic and political-critical art by considering the aesthetics of form as the aesthetics of meaning. The aesthetic has been identified (in the purist versions of it) with the formal aspect of the work. Political art is usually defined as a matter of content and meaning. This section argues that form, is also meaningful and political without ceasing to be aesthetic.

⁶⁷ For instance, Martin Seel argues that the aesthetic should begin with a concept of ‘appearing’ [Erscheinen] as the crucial shared property of all aesthetic objects; in consequence an aesthetic experience amounts to apprehending “things and events in respect to how they appear momentarily and simultaneously to our senses” (Martin Seel, “Aesthetics of Appearing”, Stanford University Press, 2005, p. 12).

2.1. The Aesthetic

Often, referring to something as “aesthetic” is to refer to it as “beautiful”, “tasteful” or “formal”. However, there is no all encompassing definition of the concept of the aesthetic because the term is vague and polysemic. Some contemporary philosophers have argued that the concept of the ‘aesthetic’ is vacuous and indefinable and ought to be purged from philosophy of art.⁶⁸ Apart from philosophical environments (and, sometimes, even within these environments) the usage of this contested term is avoided. As Nick Zangwill points out, “the aesthetic” is a debatable term and there is no single answer concerning how the term should be used.⁶⁹ But this is a contemporary pronouncement. In the last two centuries this sentence would not be acceptable because “the aesthetic” used to have a certain understanding which, for many theorists, is no longer acceptable. Born during the 18th century, the concept of the aesthetic has come to be used to designate, among other things, “a kind of object, a kind of judgment, a kind of attitude, a kind of experience, and a kind of value”.⁷⁰ That is why aestheticians are used to talk about aesthetic objects, aesthetic judgments, aesthetic attitude, aesthetic experience and aesthetic value as central to the understanding of the aesthetic. In other words, all the elements mentioned above have used to participate to the understanding of the aesthetic.

One major theoretical tendency explains the aesthetic as a special mode of sensory perception or experience that is relevant in art apprehending. Generally, the aestheticians of the last two hundred years have relied upon an understanding of the aesthetic which has to do with an immediacy thesis and a disinterestedness thesis (James Shelly). The 18th Century's immediacy thesis holds that the judgment of beauty is immediate (a straightforwardly sensory apprehending or, in other words, "we do not reason to the conclusion that things are beautiful", but rather "taste" that they are). The disinterestedness thesis holds that the pleasure in the beautiful is a disinterested pleasure (various versions of this theory can be found in Immanuel Kant, Arthur Schopenhauer, Ronald Hepburn and in arguments of the aesthetic attitude theorists).⁷¹ As James Shelley points out, "much of the history of more recent thinking about the concept of the aesthetic can be seen as the history of the development of the immediacy and disinterestedness theses".⁷² In very general lines, something (an artistic or natural object) is "aesthetic" if it is pleasing in appearance (where the pleasure is immediate and disinterested), and thus affords an aesthetic experience.

⁶⁸ Marshall Cohen, “Appearance and the Aesthetic Attitude”, Journal of Philosophy 56, pp.915-926 and George Dickie, “The Myth of the Aesthetic Attitude”, American Philosophical Quarterly Vol. 1, No. 1, 1964, pp. 56-65.

⁶⁹ Nick Zangwill, “The Concept of the Aesthetic”, Blackwell Publishers, 1998, p. 78.

⁷⁰ James Shelley, “The Concept of the Aesthetic”, Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, source: <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/aesthetic-concept/> (last accessed 5 August 2013).

However, my concern here is not with the aesthetic in general (since we might find non-art aesthetic) but with the aesthetic in relationship with art. The line of reasoning widely accepted in the past, goes like this: the aesthetic pleasure we take in experiencing art is associated with artwork's form, where "form refers to the visible elements of a piece, independent of their meaning".⁷³ The good old distinction between art's form (aesthetic) and art's content (non-aesthetic) is still a starting point for some contemporary theorists in separating the aesthetic from whatever else can be found in an art piece (moral, political, art historical elements).

⁷¹ Though Kant followed the British in applying the term "disinterested" strictly to pleasures, its migration to attitudes is not difficult to spot.

⁷² James Shelley, "The Concept of the Aesthetic", Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, source: <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/aesthetic-concept/> (last accessed 5 August 2013).

⁷³ The definition of 'form' can be found in: http://arthistory.about.com/cs/glossaries/g/f_form.htm (last accessed 23 May 2012).

Many art theorists complain that the concept of “the aesthetic is inherently problematic and it is only recently that we have managed to see that it is”.⁷⁴ The contemporary aesthetician Nick Zangwill starts his article “The Concept of the Aesthetic” with the following questions: “Can the contemporary concept of the ‘aesthetic’ be defended? Is it in good shape or is it sick? Should we retain it or dispense with it?”⁷⁵ There are no simple answers to these questions. Why is this so? First of all, the concept of the aesthetic has several meanings, being employed both in a philosophical sense, and in general discussions of a historically specific sensibility (like in the case of “The Aesthetic of Romanticism” or “The Aesthetic of Cubism”). Even if many times there is “no rigorous separation between aesthetics in a philosophical, specialist sense, and general discussions of period sensibility”, we cannot merely dispense with it. As Osborne notes, the aesthetic is a necessary dimension of the historic-ontological conception of art: “the analysis of a given work will need to treat the specific historically determined character of the relationship between the aesthetic and other factors. Furthermore, these relations between the aesthetic and other aspects of art works derive their critical meaning from their relations to the equally variable aesthetic dimension of other (non-art) cultural forms”⁷⁶

Yet, even if we assume that the aesthetic has several meanings⁷⁷ and may be difficult to define, it does not follow that it is an arbitrary signifier or that we should get rid of it. It may have several different meanings and uses which obscure the meaning that this term may originally have had and then obviously, it no longer plays the role in philosophy of art and in

⁷⁴ James Shelley, “The Concept of the Aesthetic”, Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, source: <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/aesthetic-concept/> (last accessed 5 August 2013).

⁷⁵ Nick Zangwill, “The Concept of the Aesthetic”, Blackwell Publishers, 1998, p. 78.

⁷⁶ Peter Osborne, Anywhere or Not at All: Philosophy of Contemporary Art, Verso, 2013, p.67.

⁷⁷ For example Robert McGregor distinguishes the aesthetic D from the aesthetic C. The aesthetic D is a descriptive sense of the aesthetic understood by some theorists as separated from art. This sense of the aesthetic focuses on the aesthetic experience of an object surface and it excludes the meaning or the content of the object from that experience. On the other hand, the aesthetic C is another sense of the aesthetic designating relevant (i.e. good) features, properties, aspects of works of art. In the sense of the aesthetic C, meaning and content are relevant to the evaluation of the work of art. See Robert McGregor, “Art and the Aesthetic”, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 32, No. 4, 1974, p. 549-561.

art theory that is commonly supposed. The fact that we already have a formal understanding of the aesthetic with roots in 18th century does not mean that it is appropriate for the new developments of art or forever. At the same time, philosophers and art theorists deal with different senses of the aesthetic. The aesthetic in Adorno's understanding is not the same as in Benjamin's or Kant's. Some works of art engage the mind in a way which could be called "aesthetic" in Kant's sense but not in Greenberg's. By the same token, "the aesthetic" in the sense of New Criticism is not the same as "the aesthetic" in a Marxist sense. Some theorists suggest that at the end of the day it is not so important how the aesthetic is finally defined or if it is defined or not: "there are many other interesting things to do within the domain"⁷⁸ (Kendall Walton). I find this remark a bit perplexing because I don't understand how we can do "interesting things" within a domain that is so vague unless we try to make some sense of it. More than this, there is a certain, narrow understanding of the term that I would like to combat. This narrow understanding, reduces experiencing art in general (and political art in particular) to a special (purist) mode of sensory perception.

Without the ambition of offering a complete, all encompassing and everlasting definition of the aesthetic, let me suggest the following: the aesthetic in art is a kind of experiencing art which blends the object of experience and the subject who experiences that object, the cognitive and the non-cognitive, form and meaning. This kind of experiencing of art does not have to be reduced to a mode of sensory perception (as it customarily is). This does not mean that the perceptual plays no role in the aesthetic while the conceptual does the whole job. There is no need to separate the conceptual from perceptual in understanding the concept of the aesthetic. It is misleading to contrast artworks as an intellectual/conceptual object and the artworks as an informer of aesthetic experience and to claim that the aesthetic refers only to the later while the former is non-aesthetic. The way we experience an artwork is determined (to some extent) by the theories, world-views and history we bring to bear upon it. The eye is not innocent: the experience through which we see what we see and the way we see it is determined by our previous knowledge, understanding and so on. The immediacy of aesthetic experience⁷⁹ (as uninformed by art exterior factors like: theories, history, pre-conceptions, politics) is a chimera.

⁷⁸ Kendall Walton, "Aesthetics – What? Why? And Wherefore?" in Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 2, 2007, p. 149.

Another issue I need to address at this point is the so- called distinction between the aesthetic and artistic. I need to recall this issue because in my attempt to argue that political-critical art and the aesthetic can be bridged in an unproblematic manner, an opponent may raise an objection against my account by asking why do I need to treat political art from an aesthetic point of view when I can simply accept that political-critical art has an artistic dimension and value but not an aesthetic one. The fact that art has some artistic value (but not the aesthetic one) is not an acceptable solution for me because this would mean that political art is still a lesser or a defective (lower) art form.

Before offering my position regarding this objection, I will firstly detail on the distinction aesthetic-artistic itself and then I will answer to this possible objection. In the literature and discussion on the aesthetic and arts there are two theoretical positions: one distinguishes between the aesthetic and the artistic and the other, uses the two terms interchangeably. First, let's see what the two terms etymologically mean.⁸⁰

On the one hand, the concept of the “aesthetic” is seen as the more generic term (it is applicable to other areas beyond/outside the arts). Etymologically, the word comes from the Greek and it refers to sensory perception (more generally). But words do change over time their meanings, and sure the term ‘aesthetic’ has changed its meaning over the past two centuries. Nowadays, the term ‘aesthetic’ has moved away from these initial meaning (of sensibility), so that we tend to use the concept of the aesthetic as “anything having to do with beauty or arts”. Yet, vestiges of the initial meaning of the aesthetic (sensory perception) persist.

⁷⁹ Aesthetic experience understood as perceiving the art object in its own right while all other objects, events and everyday concerns are suppressed.

⁸⁰ See an example in <http://www.eurosa.org/2011/huddleston.pdf>.

On the other hand “artistic”, by contrast, comes from Latin (ars) meaning technique, skill, and craft. “Works of art” (in the original understanding of the term) were exercises of this ars (cups and swords were as much art as poems and paintings). There was no distinction at that time between artist and artisan. As Raymond William stresses, the term ‘aesthetic’ has emerged as a response to an alienating division of labour (artistic labour performed by artist and the labour of the artisan).

This etymological meaning of the aesthetic and artistic is no longer the only way of making sense of these concepts. There is no consensus on what these two terms denote or if they denote different things or not. The theorists use and explain these concepts in different ways and some of them don’t even distinguish between artistic and the aesthetic⁸¹ value of art. Yet, when philosophers of art talk of the distinction between the aesthetic and artistic properties or values of art they tend to use the term “artistic” to denote non- directly perceptible features in an artwork.⁸² Regarding “the aesthetic”, it has to be noted that this term is used at least in two senses: (a) in a wide sense which covers “every kind of artistic appreciation”⁸³ (beside the non-art objects and environments); and (b) in a narrow sense according to which there are two different types of properties in a work of art (aesthetic and artistic).⁸⁴ This distinction between aesthetic and artistic properties of art carries with it the ⁸⁴ Malcolm Budd, Stephen Davies, Bohdan Dziemidok, David Best, Cain Todd and many other contemporary aestheticians support this view.

⁸¹ See for example Dominic McIver Lopes’s, “The Myth of (Non-Aesthetic) Artistic Value” in Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 61, 244, pp. 518-536. Lopes claims that there is no characteristic artistic value which is separate/distinct from aesthetic value.

⁸² For some theorists like S. Davies an artistic property or value refers to relational properties, symbolic properties (“Dove carrying the olive branch symbolizes peace”) and to referential properties (artworks referring to other artworks like Duchamp’s ‘Mona Lisa with moustache’ referring to Da Vinci’s Mona Lisa). Other examples of artistic properties of art are: witty, originality, authenticity (and in general, the properties of the art piece which are not directly perceivable). Closely related to these artistic properties are the artistic values of mastery of execution, the force and relevance of the ideas presented in art and so on.

⁸³ See Malcolm Budd, ‘Aesthetic Essence’, in Richard Shusterman and Adele Tomlin (eds.), Aesthetic Experience, Routledge, New York, 2008, p. 20.

distinction between aesthetic and artistic value. But, as Malcolm Budd acknowledges, not everyone that accepts the distinction between artistic and aesthetic properties understands them in the same way: “But perhaps it would be agreed that artistic properties, unlike aesthetic properties, are such that they cannot be directly perceived or detected by attending exclusively to the work itself, even by someone who has the cognitive stock required to understand the work, since they are properties the work possesses only in virtue of the relations in which it stands to other things”.⁸⁵ This point of view is also sustained by Stephen Davis and Cain Todd. In other words, those properties which are experienced non-perceptually are not aesthetic properties. According to this narrow interpretation of the aesthetic, what we call “aesthetic properties” of art are formal properties (“in the sense that they depend only upon those perceptual properties, such as colour, shape, and size that constitute the ‘sensory surface’ of the work”).⁸⁶ Aesthetic properties are “the ultimate source of aesthetic value and contribute to determining the nature of the artworks”.⁸⁷

Now, I will go back to the objection an opponent may mention against my account (by asking why I have to treat political art from an aesthetic point of view when I can simply concede that political-critical art has an artistic dimension/value but not an aesthetic one). Let me firstly explain why an opponent would ask this question. I suppose that for the opponent of the coexistence of the aesthetic and political art, the latter is a non-aesthetic art (while it is still art) for several different reasons. One of these reasons might be that for this opponent, political art typically lacks aesthetic value because this type of art is not visually appealing, lacking charm, beauty or grace (it typically lacks positive aesthetic values). If the objection is made on these grounds, then it is not difficult to side step it. This opponent might assume that the aesthetic values can be exclusively understood in positive terms (like beauty, grace, charm or other traditional positive aesthetic properties) but our appreciation of art need not always be positive. There is no novelty in the fact that many aesthetic values disclose the negative aspect of the world, and this fact does not make them less aesthetic. As Maria Golaszewska points out, these are still aesthetic values: “that disclose the unfriendly, hostile aspect of the world as arousing our fear and rebellion, as unacceptable and repulsive”; she adds that “we cannot ascribe harmony or beauty to the former and expressiveness or ugliness to the latter. For we can be fascinated by both beauty and ugliness; the latter aspect of the world may also attract us, whereas the former may arouse our indifference as being too perfect, too far removed from the nightmare of everyday”.⁸⁸

⁸⁵ See Malcolm Budd, ‘Aesthetic Essence’, in Richard Shusterman and Adele Tomlin (eds.), Aesthetic Experience, Routledge, New York, 2008, p. 20.

⁸⁶ Glen Parsons, “Moderate Formalism as a Theory of the Aesthetic”, Journal of Aesthetic Education, Vol. 38, No. 3, 2004, p. 20.

⁸⁷ Nicholas Bunnin and Jiyuan Yu (eds.), Blackwell Dictionary of Western Philosophy, Wiley-Blackwell; 1 edition (January 27), 2009.

Another reason for the opponent to question the aesthetic value of political art might be that he /she assumes that in political art’s case the aesthetic experience is not possible (because political art does seem conducive to aesthetic experience). In other words, political – critical art does not possess the type of aesthetic properties which can conduct to aesthetic experience and, without this experience, we cannot evaluate it aesthetically. Aesthetic experience is the basis of, “the necessary condition for and the most important criterion of, aesthetic valuation”.⁸⁹ Both my opponent and I agree with this contention. The difference between us lies in the way we understand this experience. For the opponent, aesthetic experience of art is a sensual experience of those properties which constitute artwork’s perceivable surface. For me, aesthetic experience is a full involvement with the art piece (perceptual, cognitive and emotional).

Often, political artworks’ properties can’t simply/directly be perceived as aesthetically valuable. For the appreciation of many of them, some knowledge about the object of appreciation is necessary and this knowledge would extend beyond the directly perceivable surface (many aesthetic properties do require also some training in the spectator and this training is prerequisite for their appreciation). For example, the critical-political piece “I bite America and America bites me” (by the Russian performance artist Oleg Kulik, in 1997): the “visible surface” of this piece of art shows us the performer (Kulik) wearing nothing but a dog collar, barking at onlookers and “craning at the barred windows” from his cage-like room (on 76 Grant Street, New York). How could we aesthetically appreciate this political performance? How an aesthetic experience might have been supposed to happen? If we endorse the narrow view that the aesthetic experience is a state of mind valuable in itself in which we feel disinterested pleasure when we perceive what we see or hear in art objects, then, probably, Kulik’s performance is not conducive to an aesthetic experience of this sort.

⁸⁸ Maria Golaszewska, ‘Artistic and Aesthetic Values’, Philosophica 36(2), 1985, pp. 25-42, available online at <http://logica.ugent.be/philosophica/fulltexts/36-3.pdf> (last accessed 5 August 2013).

⁸⁹ Bohdan Dziemidok, “Artistic Formalism: Its Achievements and Weaknesses”, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 51, No. 2, 1993, p. 188.

But, as I will argue, aesthetic experience cannot be a pure experience. Just gazing at Kulik’s performance without having some knowledge about the object of appreciation does not mean to experience something. In order to be properly experienced, Oleg Kulik’s critical piece “I bite America and America bites me” requires from the audience a certain knowledge of the art history from Eastern Europe (especially the ways in which the artists from Eastern Europe regard the Western Art), a knowledge of the art theory & history (as Kulik’s performance is a response to the famous “I like America and America likes me” by Joseph Beuys), the harsh living conditions from the former Soviet bloc (where people are tired of living a dog’s life) and so on. Knowing and considering this larger context does not make the experience of Kulik’s piece non-aesthetic.

The viewer could appreciate aesthetically this piece for its courage, wit or relevance but he cannot just sense that the piece has courage, wit or relevance. All of which are non-immediately perceptible features of the piece but we still can experience them aesthetically. An aesthetic experience is a way of experiencing the relationships between what is out there (in the object) and what is in our mind about what is out there. “Experiencing” does not mean just “sensually perceiving” but also grasping an idea and the way in which that idea is expressed through art forms. An aesthetic experience is also an experience that moves us (emotionally).

Many works of political art are structured in a way that affords an aesthetic experience. The aesthetic experience is still aesthetic even if the object of this experience (political art) does not allow a ‘pure’ aesthetic experience (as in the case of absolute music).⁹⁰ Even if political art does not allow a “pure” aesthetic experience, we should not conclude that political art is artistic but not aesthetic.

Aesthetic experience is not necessarily an autonomous experience but is embedded in historically determined conditions of perception. What does this mean? This means that we should not rely on a narrow understanding of aesthetic experience but we should broaden the understanding of the concept of aesthetic experience and the understanding of the aesthetic in such a way that the aesthetic experience and political functions of a piece interact. It may be sometimes the case that certain political art pieces afford no aesthetic experience. It can happen that a certain art institution baptizes something with the label “art”, even if that something has nothing to do with art (or anti-art) but it is just a plain placard or a “mere” riot. A mere political gesture is not yet “art” if the ensemble of formal choices to embody that “politics” has nothing to do with an expected appreciation of that thing as art. Then, perhaps, not all political pieces which are called “art” are in fact art but when they are, they are valuable as art only insofar as they are the objects of aesthetic appreciation. They can afford little or considerable aesthetic appreciation but nonetheless this is an important condition for their evaluation as art.

⁹⁰ Music without extra-musical content.

To sum up, political art has both aesthetic and artistic properties/values (if we take into consideration what these two terms etymologically mean).⁹¹ Yet, the problem is that these two terms changed over time their meaning and now the aesthetic (in a narrow understanding which is also the most popular) refers to that which is immediately perceived or detected by attending exclusively to the work itself while artistic denotes those properties which depend on non-perceptible features of the work (like artwork's relation to the history of its production or to art history and theory). However, as I will show, some properties which are considered artistic in this narrow perspective but not aesthetic properties are in fact aesthetic properties (if we enlarge the concept of the aesthetic and aesthetic experience by making room for non-perceptual aesthetic properties). Attending exclusively to the work itself just for the sake of having a 'pure' experience of it does not mean to truly appreciate political art. Political-critical art is art with a political function. This means that political art is specifically intended to provoke some political reaction. This political reaction is either a response to the work's scariness, wit, courage, daring or a response to the work's beauty, ugliness or sublime. If in the case of beauty or sublime the theorists tend to agree that they are aesthetic properties, in the case of scariness, powerful, wit or daring (to name just a few examples) there is a great disagreement regarding their aesthetic status. I will tackle this issue in what follows.

⁹¹ Artistic (ars) = technique, craft, skill and Aesthetic = sense perception (in general).

2.2. The Gap between the Aesthetic and Political in Art: “This is too Political” versus “This is Too Aesthetic”

As I have already mentioned, there appears to be a gap between the aesthetic and political-critical art. Some art theorists hold that political art is not proper art because the coexistence of politics and art undermines the aesthetic dimension of art (because political art deals with problems of justice or power while the aesthetic has to do with a pleasurable experience of a special kind which happens to us when we perceive the form of art works). This section and the next one attempt to suggest the contrary. Political art can be apprehended and experienced aesthetically. Before arguing for this, let’s first explain the opposing views. There are at least two categories of detractors of the coexistence of the aesthetic and political art. Let’s start with the first category of detractors:

(1) Some contemporary art critics and art theorists question the co-existence of the political and the aesthetic in art: for instance, Donald Kuspit holds that “No doubt art can and perhaps should be a vehicle for social commentary, even exposé and editorializing- how responsible or irresponsible, effective or ineffective such disclosure and advocacy are must be debated- but the question is whether it does not compromise art in some fundamental way”.⁹² This ‘fundamental way’ that Kuspit points to but does not name is the aesthetic dimension of art. Other theorists express their worries that political art is not conducive to aesthetic experience: Hilton Kramer repeatedly has stressed that political art can have social significance but exactly this significance deemphasizes the aesthetic value. He criticized, for example, the feminist critical piece of Judy Chicago (Dinner Party), calling it “kitsch, crass, solemn and single minded”; this political art piece is, in Kramer’s opinion, “very bad art...failed art...art so mired in the pieties of a cause that it quite fails to acquire any independent aesthetic life of its own”.⁹³ But as I have argued in the first chapter, Kuspit and Kramer concede that art is not necessarily a separate realm, detached from social and political reality. Even if these theorists don’t consider art as a self-enclosing and separate entity, still they hold that art has to be appreciated in an autonomous way. So they don’t say that art has its own separate realm (and in this sense is “autonomous”), but our appreciation of art should be autonomous. This “autonomous way” of appreciating art is the aesthetic experience (perceiving the art object in its own right while all other objects, events and everyday concerns are set aside) as opposed to regular non-aesthetic experience. These criticisms directed against the co-existence of political art and the aesthetic assume that the aesthetic reception of art is different in some fundamental way from grasping the political stance of the piece, each of which nullifying the other. They assume that in a piece which is politically concerned, the aesthetic reception of art is different in some fundamental way from grasping the political stance of the piece and it should take priority over grasping the political meaning. They don’t deny that art can have some political significance if it is mixed with politics but they express their worries that exactly this political significance deemphasizes its aesthetic value because our experience of art is not an autonomous aesthetic experience. My suggestion is that these contemporary art theorists and critics are still steeped in a high modernist way of thinking and arguing about art and the aesthetic. The idea of aesthetic ‘autonomy’ (whether of the art-work as an end in itself or of a mode of experience with which it is associated), has been central not only to artistic modernity but also to the historical development of the idea of the aesthetic itself.⁹⁴

⁹² Donald Kuspit, “Activist Art and the Moral Imperative”, New Art Examiner, January 1991, p. 19.

In this understanding, there are two modes of experiencing something: the autonomous way reserved for art perception (aesthetic experience) and the everyday mode of experiencing (non-aesthetic experience). I assume that those art theorists (like Kuspit and Kramer), who reject the co-existence of political art and the aesthetic, ground their dismissal on a purist aesthetic account of art. It has to be noted that these critics erroneously assume that political-critical art is solely a content oriented art, where the message or the subject-matter is heavily politicized while the form (which is for them the truly/pure aesthetic component of an art piece) is unimportant (or it merely follows the political function/message). Thus, these critics reject the co-existence of political art and the aesthetic on the grounds that what they envision to be “the aesthetic” is a certain understanding of the aesthetic which emphasizes the idea of an autonomous, purist mode of experiencing art. To sum up, this theoretical stand rejects the political from art because the political is detrimental to the aesthetic experience. The other theoretical position, which also finds that there is a gap between political art and the aesthetic rejects the aesthetic as being detrimental to the political. In what follows, I will discuss this assumption as well.

⁹³ Hilton Kramer, “Art: Judy Chicago's Dinner Party Comes to Brooklyn Museum”, The New York Times, 17 October 1980.

⁹⁴ In the previous chapter I have discussed at large the underlying assumptions on the basis of which these contemporary art theorists support the autonomy of art and the aesthetic (the two autonomist views are discussed in the section 1.1.2. of the first chapter).

(2) The aesthetic is, for many critical and cultural theorists, a troubled notion. The charge is constant even though the grounds differ. The most frequent critique of the aesthetic asserts that the aesthetic is an ideological construct. With the advent of Conceptual art⁹⁵ (mid of the 20th Century) the concept of the aesthetics is under pressure. This theoretical and artistic reaction against the aesthetic is the core of many current neo-Avant-Garde practices. These contemporary neo-(conceptual) artistic and theoretical trends have replaced the old dogma demanding that art had to be beautiful with the new dogma that art “does not have to be aesthetic”.⁹⁶ The repudiation of the aesthetic is for contemporary conceptual arts and theories the new golden rule of art making and understanding. To look aesthetically is a ⁹⁵ Conceptual art is an art practice and theory that become prominent in the ‘60s. Conceptual art attacked the aesthetic definitions of art (based on beauty, pleasantness, and gracefulness) and replaced the focus from art’s form to content. Conceptual art project is political in the sense that these art practices rejected beauty and sensual surface, hoping to give back to art its critical potential. Art which is conceptual uses language as its medium as a critical-political stance directed against art’s commodification.

⁹⁶ Matilde Carrasco Barranco, “The Dogma of Post-Conceptual Art. The Role of the Aesthetic in the Art of Today”; source: The European Society for Aesthetics, source: <http://www.eurosa.org/2012/carrasco.pdf> (accessed 7 September 2012).

‘defect’. I note in parenthesis that whatever these contemporary trends understand when they use the concept of the aesthetic, their new dogma of de-aestheticizing art is just the new hegemony of art producing and theorizing. It is just replacing hegemony (modernist, formalist) with another (the so-called “post-aesthetic”, “beyond aesthetics”). The concept of the aesthetic is for many contemporary political artists and art theorists an “enemy of the people”.⁹⁷ They understand the notion of the “aesthetic” as an ideological construct created by the upper class, or by the cultural elite to define their own taste and to exclude less fortunate people. Thus, they understand the aesthetic negatively because they identify it with complicity with power and with the forces of capital. Roger Taylor, for instance, claimed that “all art is an enemy of the people and aesthetic art is the worst enemy”. Griselda Pollock thought that political art must reject all forms of aesthetic value because the aesthetic requirements of unity and pleasant form damage the political message. John Berger also posits that “we can only make sense of art if we judge it by the criterion of whether or not it helps men to claim their social rights”. And Pierre Bourdieu argues that “the category of the aesthetic is a bourgeois illusion. The elites dictate what aesthetic value is and make it universal...” It is often said that “aesthetics” is an ugly word, outdated and sluggish and, that moreover, “whoever deals nowadays with aesthetics dissects a corpse”.⁹⁸ Why do these theorists believe this? What underlies their rejection of the aesthetic?

The detractors of the aesthetic usually invoke Marx’s authority but they seem to be more Marxist than Marx. For Marx the aesthetic is not at all an “enemy of the people”. Marx not only defended the necessity of art, but he also thought that aesthetic taste can itself be subject to revolution because there is more to aesthetic appreciation than the consensus of the elite. Of course that aesthetic responses are “socially conditioned”, but there is nothing ⁹⁷ See for example Roger L. Taylor, Art, an Enemy of the People, Hassocks, Sussex: Harvester, 1978, pp. 49-50; see also Terry Eagleton, The Ideology of the Aesthetic, Oxford: Blackwell, 1990.

⁹⁸ Ulrich Schödlbauer’s contention quoted in Michael Martin, source: <http://pmc.iath.virginia.edu/text-only/issue.504/14.3martin.txt> (accessed 12 October 2011).

“bourgeois” about the aesthetic (although aesthetic tastes may vary with social groupings).⁹⁹ There is nothing “bourgeois” about our “general capacity” to have aesthetic responses and make aesthetic judgments. What these judgments consist in and how are they contextually determined is another issue. As noted, I assume that these rejections of the aesthetic are based on a confusion (the aesthetic is identified with a certain, purist understanding of it) which has led these theorists to jettison the aesthetic from art’s theory.

Figure 1. Unhealthy Aestheticism, Studio Gallery for Young Artists, Budapest, Hungary (this gallery is well-known for displaying critical art and for rejecting ‘the aesthetic’ as unhealthy)

This avoidance is a consequence of the popularity Clement Greenberg had with his so called “modernist formalist aesthetics”. Greenberg’s legacy influenced both theoretical and philosophical aesthetics. His undertakings have been exclusivist and forcefully collated with Kant’s aesthetics or, more accurately put it, with Kant’s theory of taste (and not with Kant’s theory of art). Greenberg’s idea of the aesthetic is essentially empiricist: aesthetics is a cognitively uninfected perception at the basis of aesthetic judgment (however, this position owes more to Hume than to Kant). In spite of the irony directed at Greenberg's understanding of the aesthetic, after the 60's many aestheticians, art theorists, cultural theorists, sociologists and artists still operate with this understanding of the aesthetic. They assume that the aesthetic is what Greenberg takes it to be.

⁹⁹ Nick Zangwill, “Against the Sociology of the Aesthetic”, in Cultural Values, Vol. 6, No. 4, p. 2002, pp. 443-452.

Pierre Bourdieu, for example, states that the aesthetic has to do with the properties of "gratuitousness, the absence of function, the primacy of form over function, disinterest and so on..."¹⁰⁰ and, that high art favours the pleasure in the beautiful over the pleasure in the agreeable (while working-class people prefer to take pleasure in the agreeable). He obviously refers to Kant's distinction between the beautiful and the agreeable. He uses Kant's distinction to make another distinction between "high and low forms of art (suggesting that the aesthetic pleasure in the beautiful is an elitist construct on the basis of which high art is favoured over low art). But, Kant's distinction between pleasure in the beautiful and pleasure in the agreeable has absolutely nothing to do with the distinction between high and low art forms".¹⁰¹ At the same time, the claim that the aesthetic has to do with gratuitousness, "the absence of function, the primacy of form over function or disinterest" is problematic as well because this view is just a narrow understanding of the aesthetic (Kant would not agree with it).¹⁰²

Yet, both categories of detractors (the "diehard" conservatives like Kramer and Kuspit and those who find that the aesthetic undermines the political) ground their rejection on a purist understanding of the aesthetic. However, the purist approach to art is no longer acceptable in philosophy of art. In short, the conception of the aesthetic these critics operate with is a straw man. If the aesthetic is tied to certain set of requirements (immediacy, disinterestedness, a certain kind of pleasure...) then of course that there will be a gap between political art and the aesthetic. But there is no need to rely on this understanding of the aesthetic according to which an object is aesthetic or is aesthetically experienced only if it is depoliticized (or an object can only have political functions if it is de-aestheticized). This is not the right way to speak of the aesthetic dimension of art. The concept of the aesthetic has been conflated by these critics with one version of it (the purist aesthetics account). One of the consequences of this conflation is that we are forced to choose either the aesthetic or the political in appreciating an art work. But this opposition is a false dilemma.

¹⁰⁰ Pierre Bourdieu, "On the Historical Genesis of a Pure Aesthetic", The Rules of Art, Cambridge: Polity, 1996, p.285.

¹⁰¹ Nick Zangwill, "Against the Sociology of the Aesthetic", Cultural Values, Vol. 6, No. 4, p. 2002, pp. 443-452.

¹⁰² Several contemporary aestheticians have successfully proved the fact that there are resources in Kant's theory of art as opposed to Kant's theory of taste. Kant is misread by many theorists (including Greenberg, Bourdieu and even the young Danto) for holding a theory of the pure judgments of taste to underwrite a theory of artistic value, as if Kant himself had had nothing to say about fine arts. As Diarmuid Costello points out, Kant should not be seen as "an arch-formalist in art theory" because for him works of art as seen as "expressions of aesthetic ideas, and hence as having a distinctive cognitive function" – Diarmuid Costello, "Greenberg's Kant and the Fate of Aesthetics in Contemporary Art Theory", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 2, 2007, p. 221.

2.3. The Aesthetic and Political-Critical Art: Bridging the Gap

It is many times held that we have at our disposal three grand theories of art: a pre-aesthetic theory (before the 18th century), the aesthetic theories of art (from the end of 17th century to the mid 20th century, and postmodern (post-aesthetic) theories (after the '60s). The pre-aesthetic theory of art holds that art is more a matter of skill and it performs various functions (religious, practical and so on). The aesthetic theories of art tend to emphasize art's aesthetic function as its main/primary function (art is created for its own sake and it is enjoyed for its own sake). The postmodern theory rejects all traditional aesthetic theories of art and the 'grand narrative' of beauty. According to this scheme, all contemporary art is post-aesthetic art. However, not everyone agrees with this. Some theorists claim that we still live in aesthetic modernism while others believe that modernism is already passé and we live now in a post-art/post-aesthetic era (Hal Foster, Douglas Crimp, and Craig Owens).

I don't endorse the view according to which art after the 60s is non-aesthetic. On the contrary, by extending its boundaries to accommodate Avant-Garde art as well, the aesthetic is more reborn than dead and buried. Even though for many art theorists, the aesthetic is obsolete and irrelevant in contemporary art theory still we cannot merely get rid of it: "as long as people review and evaluate cultural expressions and make choices about what to preserve, study, and recommend, however, they will seek to define and re-define standards of judgments and thereby fall back into aesthetics".¹⁰³ In spite of all the disagreements regarding the coexistence of critical-political art and the aesthetic, often both the artist and the public are not able to totally step out of such discourse (aesthetic discourse) into some removed critical space only. In other words, the public appreciates in political-critical art the artistic or the aesthetic dimension of it and not only the critical stance that piece stresses (or both simultaneously). That is why the public expresses its appreciation or support for a political piece of art in aesthetic terms, by saying that the piece is "daring, moving, sublime, beautiful, courageous or witty". This is because they are referring to political art qua art and not as social journalism or political discourse with no relation to art.

In what follows, I attempt to argue that the incompatibility between the aesthetic and political art is a false incompatibility. Those who contest this relationship, usually claim that political art exhibits properties which are not aesthetic. They claim that political art may present us some valuable properties (like, for example, the artistic properties of originality, revolutionariness, aboutness and other properties of the artworks which are not directly perceivable) but this does not make it an aesthetic art. All these properties (revolutionariness, originality and so on) are not aesthetic properties in this view, because they cannot be directly perceived by attending exclusively to the work itself since "they are properties the work possesses only in virtue of the relations in which it stands to other things”.¹⁰⁴ These “other things” are non-perceptible and external to the art work.

¹⁰³ Emory Elliot, "Cultural Diversity and the Problem of Aesthetics", in Emory Elliot, Louis Freitas Caton and Jeffrey Rhyne (eds.), Aesthetics in a Multicultural Age, Oxford University Press, New York, 2002, p. 9.

As already stated, I attempt to explain that political art exhibits relevant aesthetic properties and these aesthetic properties allow us to experience this art aesthetically. The aesthetic properties play a crucial role in what we call “the aesthetic experience of art”. Objects in general and artworks in particular have the ability to occasion aesthetic experiences. There is this tendency in traditional aesthetics to hold that artworks generate aesthetic experience because of their external appearance (form and aesthetic properties understood in the sense as directly perceivable entities). For example, for David Prall, the aesthetic, properly understood is “what is apprehended directly and immediately by sensation”.¹⁰⁵ But, whatever we define the aesthetic (narrowly or widely) we have to take into consideration the experience through which the viewer encounters the artwork (the aesthetic experience). Then, an enlarged conception of aesthetic experience is part of the enterprise of re-defining the concept of the aesthetic. My proposal to bridge the gap between the aesthetic and political art (by enlarging the concept of the aesthetic in order to accommodate radical and edgy art forms), cannot overlook the important distinction between (at least) two senses of the aesthetic experience: (a) the traditional, narrow, affect-oriented concept of aesthetic experience, and (b) the enlarged, content-oriented concept of aesthetic experience. The traditional, the narrow one, exclusively focuses on the specific pleasure and disinterestedness of the spectator and the second focuses on the aesthetic properties of the work (in other words, the aesthetic experience of a piece has artwork’s aesthetic properties as its content).¹⁰⁶ All aesthetic experiences of art have content (the term content does not refer here to art’s content. Content here means: the object or the properties of that object toward which the experience is directed). What comprises then the content of aesthetic experience of art? The form and the aesthetic properties is the kind of the most common answer. Yet, as I will show below, both “form” and “aesthetic properties” can be understood differently (form can be understood in terms of meaningfulness and aesthetic properties can be understood as non-directly-perceptual properties).

¹⁰⁴ Malcolm Budd, “Aesthetic Essence”, in Richard Shusterman and Adele Tomlin (eds.), Aesthetic Experience, Routledge, New York, 2008, p. 20.

¹⁰⁵ David Prall, Aesthetic Judgment, Crowell, New York, 1967, p. 19.

¹⁰⁶ Noël Carroll has argued for the extension of the traditional, narrow understanding of the aesthetic experience in Beyond Aesthetics, Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Noel Carroll stresses that not all artworks are pleasurable or valuable for their own sake but sometimes works are valued for their ritual, political or cognitive value. So pleasure is not a necessary condition for having aesthetic experience. Like Carroll, I don’t endorse the conventional understanding of aesthetic experience because if the focus is on a certain type of pleasure (the affect-oriented concept of aesthetic experience), then political art will never be the promoter of that type of pleasure (because political art is a difficult art, many times a displeasing and edgy art). The second sense of aesthetic experience seems to better support the point I want to make. The “content oriented” account of aesthetic experience (Carroll’s) is advantageous for the plurality of ways in which the experience of artworks is valuable. By shifting the focus of aesthetic experience from pleasure and disinterestedness to “the kind of objects toward which the experience is directed”¹⁰⁷ our aesthetic experience is enlarged in such a way that allows us to value art morally or politically (not only for its own sake as in the narrow, traditional understanding of the aesthetic experience).

The contemporary debates on the nature of aesthetic experience make room for a wide range of objects which can be experienced this way. Political art is one of them. This is a good thing since the traditional account of aesthetic experience (Hutcheson, Beardsley and others) is framed in terms of pleasure and the aesthetic experience of some art (including political art) may not be pleasurable on this account. The other crucial point of the traditional account of aesthetic experience (beside pleasure) is the notion that that experience is valued for its sake alone and not for the sake of something else. There have been in the past different focuses on aesthetic experience (e.g. for Kant, the focus was “the disinterested pleasure”, for Bell was “artistic form”). Now the focus is the content of experience. This content is not necessarily accessed perceptually (or at least it is not accessed through a cognitively uninfected perception).

¹⁰⁷ Noël Carroll, Art in Three Dimensions, Oxford University Press, 2012, p.101.

In spite of all criticism directed against political-critical art, which renders this art as a counterexample to the aesthetic accounts on art, political art does not reject the possibility of aesthetic experience (it rejects only a certain historical version of it). If we consider the second sense of the concept of aesthetic experience (Carroll’s, the content oriented – where the objects towards which aesthetic experience is directed are the aesthetic properties of the artworks) then, most probably, political art (and even the imperceptible, conceptual instances of political art) can be aesthetically experienced. But then, both “form” and “aesthetic property” have to be understood differently if we want to enlarge the concept of the aesthetic. Form does not only refer to the visible/perceivable elements of an artwork, and aesthetic properties are not only those features perceived in the artwork when approached for its own sake. But the question is now, how exactly and what counts as an aesthetic property and formal relation. In what do they consist? How do we detect them?

Political art’s aesthetic properties cannot be always perceived by the means of the five senses but this does not mean that they lack. As James Shelley points out a non-perceptual property is still an aesthetic property.¹⁰⁸ He advocates an aesthetic theory of art in which all artworks are aesthetic (including neo-avant-garde, non-perceptual works). Usually, aesthetic theories of art try to explain “what makes x an artwork” by providing a general theory based upon aesthetic properties. These aesthetic properties are defined as properties perceived by the senses that are relevant to their appreciation as artworks. Shelley outlines what he thinks are the three main claims of the aesthetic theories on art in the attempt to make room for imperceptible art and avant-garde art within the aesthetic domain. He also observes that these three main claims of the aesthetic accounts on art are not compatible together and then he envisions possible ways out. These positions are:

¹⁰⁸ For an interesting development of this idea see James Shelley, “The Problem of Non-Perceptual Art”, British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 43, No. 4, 2003, pp. 363-378.

“R. Artworks necessarily have aesthetic properties which are relevant to their appreciation as artworks.

S. Aesthetic properties necessarily depend, at least in part, on properties perceived by the means of the five senses.

X. There exist artworks that need not be perceived by the means of the five senses to be appreciated as artworks”.¹⁰⁹

If we agree with the propositions R and S (as Monroe Beardsley does), then avant-garde, non-perceptible art will not be considered art (because R claims that art works necessarily have aesthetic properties and S claims that aesthetic properties necessarily depend on properties perceived). But this is not an acceptable solution for aesthetic theory of art because people do consider avant-garde, non-perceptual pieces, art. To accept R and S means to refute X (to refute X means to deny that Duchamp’s “Fountain”, literature, and other conceptual pieces are art).

To affirm S and X (“Aesthetic properties necessarily depend, at least in part, on properties perceived by the means of the five senses” (S) and “There exist artworks that need not be perceived by the means of the five senses to be appreciated as artworks” (X) means to refute R (“Artworks necessarily have aesthetic properties which are relevant to their appreciation as artworks”).¹¹⁰ This possible solution does not deny the art status for literature or other conceptual pieces (like Duchamp’s) but it divides art in aesthetic and non-aesthetic ¹⁰⁹ James Shelley, “The Problem of Non-Perceptual Art”, British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 43, No. 4, 2003, p. 364.

¹¹⁰ James Shelley, “The Problem of Non-Perceptual Art”, British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 43, No. 4, 2003, p. 364.

(Danto's early philosophy of art is close to this view). This implies that the appreciation of aesthetic art is radically different from the appreciation of non-aesthetic art. This claim is also questionable because we cannot decide what does make them art? What makes non-aesthetic art, art? If not all art can be appreciated aesthetically then we must provide a different general theory of art. Shelley claims that aesthetic theories of art must avoid making this claim (namely that there is non-aesthetic art and aesthetic art).

Another solution would be to refute S and to affirm R and X. To refute S for Shelley means to deny that aesthetic properties are essentially perceptual. In this way avant-garde, non-perceptual art works are still appreciated aesthetically.

Shelley outlines three possible ways out for aesthetic theories of art but supports only one of them – that is, the third solution. One can affirm R and X and deny S.¹¹¹ The first solution denies the existence of non-perceptual art (If I apply Shelly's first solution to political art, then a large part of political art would be non-art, because a large part of political art is not completely perceptual); the second solution denies that all art contains aesthetic properties (in this case we will have political art which is aesthetic and political art which is non-aesthetic); the third solution (that advocated by Shelley) enlarges the aesthetic to such an extent that political art will inhere it. Even if "more work has to be done"¹¹² to the non-perceptual aesthetic, it is still the most daring and fruitful attempt to integrate avant-garde contemporary art within the aesthetic domain. We can aesthetically appreciate a work for its relevance, braveness, wit, courageousness, criticality or creepiness, without alluding to its purely perceptual aesthetic qualities such as "harmony of parts", "unity" or "symmetry", or other qualities which one could experience by seeing or hearing.

The aesthetic properties of an object depend only in part on properties perceived by means of the five senses, but this does not mean that they always depend exclusively on them.

¹¹¹ Idem, pp. 364-365.

¹¹² Angharad Shaw, "Can Aesthetic Theories of Art Be Rescued From the Problem of Avant-Garde and Other Non-Perceptual Artworks?", Postgraduate Journal of Aesthetics, 2007, Vol. 4, No. 1, p. 37.

The fact that sometimes we cannot watch, touch or hear critical-conceptual pieces of art does not mean that aesthetic experience is suppressed or impossible. As Shelley claims, we are “struck” with daring and wit and our aesthetic experience is not a matter of focusing our attention (in a disinterested attitude) on the perceptual appearance of the art piece that stands before us. Shelley explicitly points out, that non-perceptual aesthetic properties strike us and are thus felt “not through the five senses”. This means that non-perceptual aesthetic properties (like daring, wit, revolutionariness) are felt properties (but not through the five senses): feeling the power of a novel or grasping that Fountain is witty does not come from the sight of the words or surfaces.

Shelley’s solution allows to a considerably larger number of political-critical art pieces to be considered aesthetic pieces. Political art (when is art and not mere activism, improperly called “art”) can be apprehended aesthetically on this account of non-perceptual aesthetic properties. What makes it aesthetic is not the way it appears to our senses but the way it affects us by striking us with the ideas conveyed (these ideas are aesthetic ideas).

An example of a powerful aesthetic idea is offered by Danto when he speaks of the Hungarian artist Agnes Eperjesi.¹¹³ Eperjesi collects commercial packaging, plastic bags and wrappings of household products and re-creates them as art objects of irony. Her technique is a complex one: she removes these materials from their original context and re-arranges them in art series which have a new meaning (both literal and symbolic). She adds to these new images titles/captions which often express ideas that the images alone do not express. As Danto says the artist: “often selects her images with the intention of using them to convey how women in contemporary Hungary regard themselves, and how they think about the housework for which the product designed by the image is intended to be used”.¹¹⁴

¹¹³ Arthur Danto, “Embodied Meanings, Isotypes, and Aesthetical Ideas”, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 1, 2007, pp. 121-129.

¹¹⁴ Arthur Danto, “Embodied Meanings, Isotypes, and Aesthetical Ideas”, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 1, 2007, p. 122.

For example, one of her pieces shows a woman looking like a bride in her veil (which also can be a handkerchief). Beneath that image Eperjesi wrote: “Once in a while something gets into my eyes. Then I can let go of my feelings”. The image is not necessarily pleasing or clearly shaped and the so-called aesthetic properties of it are hard to trace. We cannot claim that this picture has beauty or, if not beauty, then another aesthetic property (say, elegance). At least, we cannot detect these properties by directly perceiving the image. But even if the directly perceivable surface of this work does not seem beautiful does not mean that the idea expressed is not. The idea of this work is aesthetic and it contributes both to the work’s meaning and to the way we appreciate this meaning. The aesthetic idea is “merely one meaning given through another, as in irony or in metaphor”.¹¹⁵ Therefore, the aesthetic idea is not just a meaning but a transfiguration of that meaning. Then, the innocent, even the placid image of a woman holding a handkerchief (this sole image having whatever meaning) is turned into a psychological representation of a hidden feeling and a critical remark on repression for the sake of appearance.

This transfiguration of the meaning of the initial image takes place when we grasp the idea of the work by reading her sentences beneath images: “Once in a while something gets into my eyes. Then I can let go of my feelings”. These ideas alone (without the image of the women holding the handkerchief) would not make a piece of art aesthetic. By the same token, the image directly perceived (without the title/caption) would not be aesthetically relevant. But, the two entities together have aesthetic value because of the ideas they put forth. The fact that we perceive an image with a woman with (possibly) a handkerchief and some streams of words beneath this image does not make this piece aesthetic.

Then, aesthetic properties don’t necessarily depend on properties perceived by the means of the five senses. This does not mean that we don’t access artworks perceptually. We do, but this does not mean that we appreciate art aesthetically on this ground. And, even if we would struggle to “purely” perceive an art piece in itself and for itself (without any other external knowledge about the object of our appreciation), this effort would be useless because perception starts from our experiential background. This background influences what we perceive, how we perceive and so on.

¹¹⁵ Idem, p. 127.

The theory of non-perceptual aesthetic properties helps us to integrate critical art within the aesthetic realm even when this art is produced in conceptual/dematerialized¹¹⁶ forms (Conceptual Arts, Non-Object Arts). Yet, at this point an opponent can claim that conceptual, political-critical art has only propositional or informational value (and not aesthetic-value) and he can ask how one can distinguish between aesthetic ideas and mere ideas which have a similar propositional or informational content but are not aesthetic ideas (this is the main criticism which can be addressed to Shelly’s account too, namely that it does not seem clear where is the demarcation between an aesthetic idea and a regular (non-aesthetic) idea).

The answer is that political-critical art does not have only propositional or informational value. If it would have had only propositional or informational value would have not be considered art. That is not to say that art cannot be informative; it is only to say that it is not the main function of art to be informative, that is, not part of what it is to be a work of art. Even conceptual art does not have only propositional value but also aesthetic value. In the light of the last one, conceptual art may be able to produce another kind of knowledge – one that is non-propositional because it also allows us to engage imaginatively with the idea it set out to convey. The manner in which we relate to that idea expressed through art goes beyond the mere propositional knowledge conveyed by it. The aesthetic ideas present indirectly, metaphorically and imaginatively what cannot be presented directly. Many aesthetic ideas presented in political art are political ideas which are transfigured in a metaphoric or ironic way.

¹¹⁶ Art’s de-materialization (or immaterial art) refers to the creation of a conceptual art piece as opposed to the creation of a material object (according to Lucy Lippard and John Chandler, in “The Dematerialization of Art”, Artpluse Magazine, 1968). A conceptual piece emphasizes the thinking process or the idea and considers the art object obsolete. It is said that “the conceptual is superior” or “it over-determines the material in an art piece”. For the conceptual artist Sol LeWitt, “the idea becomes a machine which makes the art” (in “Paragraphs on Conceptual Art”, Artforum, June, 1967). In short, art’s dematerialization refers to those art practices (conceptual art) which emphasize the idea communicated by art as idea and not its formal aspects. As Kristine Stiles points out, “the dematerialization of art was more a strategy for repositioning art in relationship to politics – not a shift from material per se, but a shift from an artwork’s value as an object of commercial exchange to its value as aesthetic and political interchange” (Kristine Stiles, “Language and Concepts”, in Kristine Stiles and Peter Selz (eds.), Theory and Documents of Contemporary Art, University of California Press, Los Angeles, 1996, p. 806).

For example the political poster “You Write What You’re Told” expresses the critical idea that corporate news are not unbiased. This idea is transmitted through the political poster in the form of the ironic sentence declaimed by a journalist: “Thanks, corporate news! We couldn’t control the people without you!” This critical-political idea is translated into an aesthetic device which expresses the same thing but in a different form. It does not just transmit information but also it leaves space for public’s interpretation and imagination.

Some philosophers prefer to say that the type of cognitive value that conceptual, critical art has is more experiential than propositional.¹¹⁷ It tells us “what it is like to be this or that” (it has an imaginative component attached to the cognitive) rather than “there is this or that”. In other words, we have a first and personal experience of the idea central to the art piece and we don’t merely think about that idea (as in propositional knowledge). We grasp, deal and involve with the idea than merely think of it.¹¹⁸ Typically but not exclusively, political art (especially in our days) manifests both its politics and its art-hood in conceptual forms.¹¹⁹ It is more often Performance, Installation or Body Art than painting or sculpture. I have to introduce a footnote here: the fact that contemporary political art is more a type of conceptual art does not mean that we cannot find relevant examples of contemporary political-critical art which express their politics in traditional forms (like Fernando Botero's paintings of "Abu Ghraib" and different forms of applied art like Arpilleras).¹²⁰

¹¹⁷ For example see Elisabeth Schellekens, “The Aesthetic Values of Ideas”, in Peter Goldie and Elisabeth Schellekens (eds.), Philosophy and Conceptual Art, Oxford University Press, 2007, p. 106.

¹¹⁸ Ibidem.

¹¹⁹ The expression “conceptual forms” refers to the variety of forms in which Conceptual Art can operate. “Conceptual Art” covers different kinds of works, from photographs and films to Body Art, Performance, Installation, Happening and so on.

Conceptual art(s) is that art in which the idea or the concept involved in the art piece takes priority over the traditional aesthetics of art making and consuming. Initially, the conceptual artists used only the language as their exclusive medium. This manner of art-making was revolutionary and radically different from the traditional forms of art making. The conceptual artist rejected the traditional ideas of museum, art gallery, genius (as the creator of art), beauty (as sensually pleasant surface or form), traditional painting or sculpture (figuration, perspective, colour) and art as commodity. It is not a novelty that the entire conceptual project is anti-aesthetic,¹²¹ manifesting its opposition by rejecting the traditional artistic media (like painting and sculpture) in favour of new media of art production like ready-mades, mixed media, film and photography. Initially, these conceptual artists were critical toward the commodification of art and this was the reason why they give up the object (the art object) in the traditional sense (paintings, sculptures, decorative objects) and they focused on non-material art (ephemeral texts, happenings, performances).¹²²

Conceptual arts are relevant examples of art which makes critical claims about the successful art of the past and about the role of the artist. Some artists argue that there is no difference between political art and conceptual art because both of them downgrade the aesthetic concerns for a relevant message. Yet, this is only half accurate: political-critical art

¹²⁰ We don't have to underestimate the revolutionary potential of craft and folklore.

¹²¹ Anti-Aesthetic refers to an art movement which rejects the traditional aesthetics (especially the ideas of aesthetic experience as something which exists without a purpose; the paradigm of beauty as an immediate and disinterested pleasure; the "art for art's sake" doctrines, the ideas that art has to be beautiful, etc.). Anti-aesthetic art is not non-aesthetic even if it goes against the traditional aesthetics. This anti-aesthetic art manifests its opposition through ugliness, unpleasantness, shock, gore. But all this negative strategies don't step outside the aesthetic domain. As Diarmuid Costello suggests, "one ought to calibrate claims about what counts as 'aesthetic', 'anti-aesthetic' and 'non-aesthetic' to the relative restrictedness of the aesthetic theory in question" (Diarmuid Costello, "Danto and Kant. Together at Last?", in Mark Rollins (ed.), Danto and His Critics, Wiley-Blackwell, 2012, p. 156).

¹²² I have to note that not all the conceptual project is politically and critically engaged. Damien Hirst started to create "conceptual" pieces using skulls, diamonds and platinum (see "For the Love of God"). He sold his art for millions of pounds.

as conceptual art strives sometimes for transmitting a relevant and critical message but this undertaking does not lower or dismisses the aesthetic concerns. The difference between aesthetic and non-aesthetic artifacts (e.g. a piece of art and a text in a newspaper) lies in the way they respectively make their statements. Perhaps, both of them present us with content or meaning but only art attempts to arrange the meaning in a medium. The arrangement of the medium fuses with the meaning conveyed by that medium. In other words, there is not just a meaning conveyed by a medium but a meaning conveyed by a medium arranged in a certain form.

Conceptual-political art focuses on ideas but this does not mean that the focus on ideas totally replaces the focus on form (or the way that idea is put forth). What is challenged by conceptual art is the way in which form and its functions are understood- as a physical entity with the function to please the viewer (conceptual art does not have a physical form as a painting has and its function is not to please the viewer). Conceptual art still has a form in spite of having transformed our expectations concerning what counts as artistic form. The ideas are not just floating in the air. Those ideas are combined in certain ways (unexpected, imaginative ways) in order to make the piece worthy of public's appreciation. Then, we can claim that aesthetic ideas can be detected both in the content of the piece and in the way in which that content is presented.

The conceptual artist may perform a political gesture by the means of art object's dematerialization (critiquing art's commodification). This dematerialization is seen as a critical attempt directed both against the art market and the art "museification" (both of them representing the hegemony). I don't want to suggest that only conceptual, dematerialized art can be political, critical and oppositional. Nevertheless, there are many instances of political-critical art whose confrontational strength lies in its materialized form and I will discuss this issue at large in the next section. Conceptual art is discussed here only as an example of art which performs an anti-aesthetic function without being non-aesthetic. A conceptual work of art is a kind of proposition “presented within the context of art as a critical comment on art”¹²³ and the idea or the concept is all that counts.

Then, perhaps, one is inclined to think that the elevation of cognitive values in conceptual art eliminates the aesthetic values as a critical and political stand. But is this philosophically sound? I don’t think that conceptual art should isolate itself from the aesthetic in order to pursue its critical aims. Conceptual and political art is not as non-aesthetic as it may seem to be, even if it performs typically as anti-aesthetics (by giving up the purely perceptual). Giving up the perceptual does not mean giving up aesthetic experience altogether. We still can have aesthetic experience of non-perceptual art because the ideas can have aesthetic force and they move us or, to quote Shelly, they strike us “with daring, and wit, and with power and beauty”.¹²⁴

There are several possible objections to the non-perceptual aesthetic theory of art. One may claim either that it is unclear what makes a non-perceptual property of art to count as an aesthetic property; or that there is no clear line of demarcation between non-perceptual aesthetic properties and the non-perceptual properties which are not aesthetic. What is the difference between an aesthetic idea and a non-aesthetic idea? These objections can be answered as follows. Firstly, a non-perceptual aesthetic property is that feature in art which is not directly available for perception. It means that our access to it is not mediated merely through the five senses. Secondly, the line of demarcation between non-perceptual aesthetic properties of art and non-aesthetic properties of objects and situations is not easy to draw. Some properties of art objects (non-perceptible, like the chemical composition of painting, cost of sculpture and perceptible properties like being green, lasting five hours, being rectangular) are obviously non-aesthetic properties.

¹²³ Joseph Kossuth, “Philosophy and Conceptual Art”, in Peter Goldie and Elisabeth Schellekens (eds.), “Philosophy and Conceptual Art”, Oxford University Press, 2007, p. 96.

¹²⁴ James Shelley, ‘The Problem of Non-Perceptual Art’, The British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 43, No. 4, October 2003, p. 378.

For some art critics, there is no need to draw this line (aesthetic versus non-aesthetic in art) since “art is life and life is art”. For the reasons discussed in the first chapter, I do not endorse this view. Yet, there are several ways in which we can demarcate non-perceptual aesthetic properties or aesthetic ideas from non-aesthetic properties or ideas. For example, the property of being “powerful” or “daring” can be both aesthetic and non-aesthetic. These properties are circumstantial (depending on the circumstances of use): powerful applied to cars is a non-aesthetic property, but to literature is aesthetic. If we talk of powerful ideas, we can say that the idea of justice is a powerful idea expressed in a newspaper (but this does not make it an aesthetic idea). The same idea of justice is expressed in a certain form in art (then, this idea, becomes an aesthetic idea). The form in which this idea is expressed is not necessarily a perceivable form. For example, the idea of justice can be expressed in art through an original, new, authentic form like in the poetic line: “Justice is a mesmerizing child of hope”. This is an unexpected, revolutionary, original form through which the idea of justice might be expressed. This expression transcends the literal meaning of the idea of justice.

Even if Shelley’s theory is not free of criticism and more philosophical work needs to be done to the non-perceptual aesthetic properties, at least his proposal highlights the available options for an enlargement of the aesthetic. The biggest risk of this enlargement might be that the aesthetic is extended to mean and enhance everything. Some criteria of demarcating the aesthetic from the non-aesthetic are necessary. However, perceiving the surface of an object just for the sake of it cannot be a reasonable criterion for demarcating aesthetic from non-aesthetic. Form could be one of these criteria. But the very concept of form has to be re-thought to make room for non-perceptual.

2.4. Aesthetically Meaningful Form: Political-Critical Art as a Matter of Form

Traditionally, form is defined as the visible/audible part of a work of art (it refers to style, technique, elements of design as independent of the art work's meaning) and content is defined as that something which is expressed by form (content is what is being depicted, the subject-matter). Vestiges of these definitions still persist in art theory and contemporary aesthetics. In this section I attempt to show that this understanding of form is not appropriate. Even if form is that which refers to style or design does not mean that a style or a design has no meaning (or even a political meaning).

The aesthetic has been identified with a specific formal aspect of the work where form is being treated as a prima facie object of the aesthetic experience (both in the traditional accounts of the aesthetic experience and in the contemporary ones). Shortly put, while the form has been treated as the locus of the aesthetic, the content is considered as its non-aesthetic counterpart. In consequence, many art theorists still treat form as the aesthetic conduct while the content is considered as just the container of meaning. Political-critical art is usually defined as art with a political message or content. In this understanding, forms and shapes of an object are paramount to its aesthetic appreciation while the content part is considered to be non-aesthetic.

So, because political art is considered to be more focused on its content, it is also seen as non-aesthetic. The formula "content versus aesthetics" is not just a way of demarcating content from form but it is also an understanding of the aesthetic (form) as opposed to art's subject matter (meaning) or the idea it puts forth. In this understanding, form is seen as the aesthetic component of art which is completely depoliticized and the content is considered as the non-aesthetic, political counterpart of the form. In what follows, I will challenge this view. I argue that the political in art is not only expressed through content but through form too.

Now, I need to introduce a disclaimer: I don't want to suggest that the aesthetic and the formal are coextensive: both content and form can be aesthetic (can be aesthetically appreciated) but when form is aesthetically appreciated, this appreciation is based on some ideas which form embodies (it is not just a pure appreciation of a pure/meaningless/functionless spatial arrangement of elements). I claim that form is not the depoliticized structure of the art piece while content is the aesthetically devaluated political significance of it. For sustaining this claim, I will argue that not only art's content has a function and a meaning (political) but also art's form. In other words, I challenge the purist claim that "form refers to the visible elements of a piece, independent of their meaning".¹²⁵

Before making this claim plentifully clear and offering my arguments to support it, I will firstly present the arguments on the basis of which the aesthetic has been identified with a specific formal aspect of the art work (classical formalism and contemporary formalism). My focus is not only to question the classical or the contemporary formalist views, but also "the influential brand of postmodern art theory" (Hal Foster, Douglas Crimp, and Craig Owens). The latter holds that postmodern art (contemporary art after the '60s) is committed to politicized subject matter while the modernist art before the '60s (which, unlike the postmodern art, is an aesthetic art) invested in "formal experimentation" that "bracketed or obscured" the political content.¹²⁶ All three theoretical positions (classical formalism, contemporary formalism and postmodern art theory) assume directly or indirectly that the political is a matter of art's content while the aesthetic is a matter of form (then, on these grounds, political art is for them non-aesthetic art).

¹²⁵ The definition of form can be found in: http://arthistory.about.com/cs/glossaries/g/f_form.htm (accessed 12 June 2012).

¹²⁶ Toni Ross, "Departures from Postmodern doctrine in Jacques Ranciere's account of the politics of artistic modernity", Transformations, No. 19, 2011.

Classical formalism's manifesto, formulated by Clive Bell at the beginning of the 20th century advances the theory of "significant form" where art appreciation is defined as a response to the purely formal qualities – the line, shape, space, texture, light, and colour – of a given work. According to this perspective the artwork's relevance, powerfulness or wittiness stems from its content, and no matter how empowering or challenging might it appear to the viewer, have nothing to do with the aesthetic. This theoretical stance is known as the classical formalist view: "the aesthetic appreciation of an artwork generally involves an attentive awareness of its sensory or perceptual qualities and does not require knowledge about its non-perceptual properties".¹²⁷ Here, the perceptual qualities are the formal qualities of the piece. To formalism, what characterizes art from an aesthetic point of view is precisely the "indifference" toward content. Contentions like "form is the 'essential' core of art" or "the formal structure is what truly constitutes a work of art" make the content of art unimportant in artwork's evaluation as art.¹²⁸ In short, what the classical formalist calls form (as the locus of the aesthetic) entails a perceivable arrangement of elements which has no function and no meaning. For the 20th century aesthetic formalism (Greenberg), form was not allowed to be used in the service of anything else but itself (not even of beauty). A work is rendered aesthetic on the basis of its form alone. The classical formalist assumes that the aesthetic dimension of an art piece certainly lies elsewhere than in their "meanings". Form is meaningless and only the content is the bearer of some meaning, ideology and message (and this content is obviously non-aesthetic). This extreme formalism has been many times criticized both in art theory and in philosophy of art.

¹²⁷ Glenn Parsons, "Against Moderate Aesthetic Formalism", Journal of Aesthetic Education, Vol. 38, No. 3, Fall 2004. p. 20.

¹²⁸ Bohdan Dziemidok states that Formalism in both its versions, radical (according to which the value of an artwork as artwork is constituted exclusively by its formal aspects) and moderate (according to which the value of an artwork as artwork is constituted primarily by its formal aspects) negate the importance of content (Bohdan Dziemidok, "Artistic Formalism: Its Achievements and Weaknesses", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 51, No. 2, 1993, p. 185).

Yet, there are several attempts to resuscitate formalism in contemporary philosophy of art. For instance, Deane Curtain posits that formalism has great merit in philosophy of art on the grounds that in the comparison between form and content, the formal elements are more “satisfying and elevating” because they inhere in the work itself while content refers to the representational elements outside of the work of art. Contemporary formalism (especially Nick Zangwill’s) argues for a moderate version of formalism. Moderate formalism is seen as a theory of the aesthetic. According to this contemporary version of formalism there are some works of art that have only formal aesthetic properties but artworks usually have both formal aesthetic properties and non-formal aesthetic properties. This view is different from the classical, extreme formalism. The classical version (the extreme formalism of Bell and Fry) is the view that all the aesthetic properties are formal. The moderate formalism holds that while some aesthetic properties of a work are formal, others are not (although at least some aesthetic properties are formal). Zangwill argues that the moderate formalist concedes two things: (a) that representational art pieces have also non-formal aesthetic properties, and (b) that ‘contextual’ works of art have non-formal aesthetic properties (where contextual works are works that are intended to be seen only in the light of other works, like Duchamp’s “L.H.O.O.Q” in the light of da Vinci’s “Gioconda”).¹²⁹

However, Zangwill stresses the fact that there is something which should be conceded to Bell and Fry (to extreme formalism), namely the fact that “the purely formal properties of representational painting should not be ignored even when the aesthetic properties determined by representations are more important”.¹³⁰ Zangwill quotes Clive Bell in his defence of moderate formalism (“to appreciate a work of art we need bring with us nothing but a sense of form and colour and a knowledge of the three-dimensional space” – Bell) and after that, he just stresses that the only problematic part from Bell’s pronouncement is “nothing but”.

¹²⁹ Nick Zangwill, “Feasible Aesthetic Formalism”, Nous, 33, No. 4, 1999, p. 612.

¹³⁰ Idem, p. 615.

Zangwill holds that if we just delete the “nothing but” part from Bell’s claim, the rest of the formalist stance remains unproblematic (“to appreciate a work of art we need bring with us a sense of form and colour and a knowledge of the three-dimensional space” – Zangwill). Yet, he does not clearly states the sense(s) in which the term form is employed in this sentence. He just mentions later the term “plastic form” that relates to formal properties of pictures that originate in the spatial relationships.

I will not criticize here once again extreme formalism. There are hundreds of academic articles which do exactly this. The claim that “all the aesthetic properties of art are formal” has been attacked by contextualist accounts of the aesthetic,¹³¹ representational theories of art,¹³² expressive accounts¹³³ of art and so on.

Contemporary formalism concedes the non-formal aesthetic properties (not all art has formal aesthetic properties). However, the moderate formalism still focuses on the centrality of a formal aesthetic consideration in aesthetic experience of art. Zangwill claims that to be purely formal, a work of art has to be non-representational as well as non-contextual. According to him, many artworks are like this (even if he also concedes for the existence of some non-formal works of art). What is problematic about this contemporary formalist account? Firstly, if contemporary formalism is taken for granted, only an extremely tiny fraction of art pieces (if any) will be purely formal because in our times it is very difficult to find examples of non-representational art works. Even abstract art is representational.¹³⁴ Further, the way in which Zangwill understands form and the formal aesthetic properties is ¹³¹ “Contextualism is the view that some non-formal properties of art, specifically properties that provide an appropriate context within which an object or event may be considered, are relevant to the constitution of that object’s or event’s aesthetic features” (Walton, Danto, Carroll).

¹³² Classical formalism is unable to account adequately for the value of artworks when that value is tied to the representational content or aspects of those works.

¹³³ It is not clear how extreme aesthetic formalism will adequately account for properties that are expressive in nature.

¹³⁴ Glen Parsons argues that it is not clear that much of abstract art is non-representational. Mondrian’s mature work are labelled as “truly abstract” by Zangwill. However, as Parsons argues, Mondrian has given little titles to his mature works (e.g. “Broadway Boogie Woogie”) which undermines their being purely abstract (Glen Parsons, “Moderate formalism as a Theory of the Aesthetic”, The Journal of Aesthetic Education, Vol. 38, No. 3, 2004, p. 12).

also problematic. He comes up with an understanding of form as a “plastic form” (that relates to formal properties of pictures that originate in the spatial relationships of elements).

This understanding of form seems a traditional one, which disregards what counts as form in contemporary arts (the presence of ideas conveyed by form). His understanding of form in visual arts as a spatial relationship of elements echoes extreme formalist’s understanding of form as visual properties “in isolation from the ideas such properties convey”. Formalism, in both its versions, extreme (according to which the value of an artwork as artwork is constituted exclusively by its formal aspects) and moderate (according to which the value of an artwork as artwork is constituted primarily by its formal aspects) negates the importance and the aesthetic relevance of content. In a nutshell, these contemporary understandings of formalism claim that the formal elements of art play an important role in the aesthetic realm (even if contemporary formalism, unlike classical, holds that this role is played only partly and not entirely). The fact that formal elements play an important role in the aesthetic realm is a reasonable claim. The problematic part of these accounts is when they attempt to argue for the aesthetic of form as opposite to meaning (where art’s form is void of any meaning).

Now I would like to go back to the initial claim, namely, that the political aspect of political art is expressed not only in the artwork's content but also in its form. Yet, when political art is a matter of form, this form is not merely a spatial relationship of purely formal qualities (like the line, shape, space, texture, light, and colour) but a meaningful entity. The aesthetic of form is not opposite to the aesthetic of meaning. What the extreme formalist calls form (as the locus of the aesthetic) entails: a perceivable arrangement of elements which has no function and no meaning. The contemporary formalists, also see form as a self-enclosed entity without reference to something external to it because only the formal elements “inhere in the work itself” while content refers to the representational elements that refer to the outside world (Curtain). An experience that relies upon content is not considered properly “aesthetic” on this account or it is at best inferior to the aesthetic experience which relies exclusively on form. But is this distinction feasible? In what follows I argue that it is not. The formal elements of an artwork are not necessarily referring to themselves without reference to something external to the work. That is to say that form does not exist only to call attention to itself but also for other purposes (like critical ones).

As stated at the beginning of this section my claim is that form is not the depoliticized and meaningless structure of the art piece while content is the aesthetically devaluated political significance of it. My purpose here is not so much to argue against classical or contemporary formalist views, but to sustain a particular conception of form (resistant, political form) which can characterize political-critical art and which can afford us an aesthetic experience. Both form and content influence the spectator’s aesthetic appreciation and not the form alone but my stake is narrower: to show that form is not the pure and depoliticized structure of art while content is the aesthetically devaluated counter-part of it.

Especially in political art’s case, form can be critical and resistant without ceasing to be aesthetic or to afford aesthetic experience. Form is not merely a spatial arrangement of elements but it has a function and a meaning. Having a meaning and a function does not make it less aesthetic. Form is as meaningful as the content is. Content and form are not completely separate components of an art work but, one is reflecting more or less accurately or successfully the other. Form can become an instrument for art’s message being adaptable to the intended purpose. In this way we can talk about a unity of form and meaning (and not a separation). The work of art stimulates its public in thinking, feeling or acting in specific ways, either along with the work or in response to it. Form has an important function here. We don’t need art to reveal us what we already know, and in the form we are already aware of. In general we know that discrimination or cruelty is bad, but what art reveals to us in formal ways is more insightful than the simple acknowledgement of this. Art does not give us information, but special insights about what “really happens”. These “special insights” are mediated by art’s form.

Can form be political, critical and meaningful in art without being less aesthetic? The point I want to make by answering this question is that in some cases, critical art’s form is not void but politically meaningful. We cannot simply separate the meaningful political content from the aesthetic form and to claim that only the content can be politicized while the form remains autonomous, pure, un-functional, meaningless or “aesthetic” (in the traditional sense). The political potential of form makes the piece of art resist the status quo but this does not mean that the form alone has a politically liberating impact. Then, Adorno is half wrong when he argues that “it is not the office of art to spotlight alternatives, but to resist by form alone the course of the world, which permanently puts a pistol to men’s heads”.¹³⁵ He is half right, because form, indeed, can have a resistant and a critical potential but he is also wrong in assuming that formal innovation on its own has a political-critical impact.¹³⁶ But even if Adorno’s aesthetic enterprise contains several indefensible claims, it is nevertheless an important step toward re-thinking the politics of form. With this shift in thinking of the aesthetic of form as political, content is not any longer the single locus of the political.

In what follows, I will support this point by exploring in depth two examples: one from traditional political art and the other from contemporary political art. These examples are evoked here because they clearly illustrate that form can have a political meaning and significance both in traditional art and in contemporary art. With the help of these two examples I intend to argue for two things. Firstly, not only content-oriented art is political.

¹³⁵ Theodor Adorno, “Commitment”, in Andrew Arato and Eike Gebhardt (eds.), The Essential Frankfurt School Reader, Continuum, New York, 1982, p. 304.

¹³⁶ Amy Mullin argues that form or stylistic technique alone cannot be liberating or resistant to status quo because many times the power gentrifies these formal innovations from arts as in the case of the successful incorporation of avant-garde stylistic techniques within advertising; see Amy Mullin, “Feminist Art and the Political Imagination”, Hypatia, Vol. 18, No. 4, Autumn-Winter, 2003, p. 207.

Sometimes, form rather than content of art exhibits a critical and political stance. Both in traditional art (where form is a spatially stable entity limited to the physical boundaries of the art object) and in contemporary art (where form is not a static, geometric and fix frame but it comes out into space as a polymorphous entity)¹³⁷ form can have a political meaning and a political function.

Secondly (as already stated) I attempt to reject an influential theoretical position of postmodern art theory (Douglas Crimp, Hal Foster and Craig Owens) which holds that postmodern art (contemporary art after the '60s) is committed to politicized subject matter while the modernist art before the '60s (which, unlike the postmodern art, is an aesthetic art) invested more in "formal experimentation" that "bracketed or obscured" the political content. The example discussed bellow is an example of "traditional" art (before the '60s). This example simply offers a piece of evidence for the fact that the postmodern art theory is wrong. The formal experimentation does not bracket the political from the content but is itself political.

The first example is Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres's painting The Martyr of Saint Symphorien, commissioned by the government in 1824. This painting has been one of the most debated pieces of art from the 19th century France art criticism. As Ingres's scholar Andrew Carrington Shelton argues, religion played a significant role in French public life in the early 1830s, "only its significance had become less a matter of good versus bad than of Left versus Right".¹³⁸ The subject matter (the content) of this painting was the death of Symphorien who was put to death for his religious beliefs (becoming one of the first Christian martyrs of Gaul). As Carrington Shelton notices, such a subject "which was as much nationalist as it was religious, was bound to appeal to Restoration officials in Paris, as it advanced their highly politicized efforts to promote the deeply Christian heritage of France”.¹³⁹

¹³⁷ Contemporary art deals less with "works of art" understood as aesthetic objects than with Interventions (both in public space and in museums), Happenings and Situations. Then, the form of a Happening is not a fix and static geometric frame because the art happening is not an object. In this case, form is a non-fix entity but a polymorphous one.

¹³⁸ Andrew Carrington Shelton, "Art, Politics and the Politics of Art: Ingres's Saint Symphorien at the 1834 Salon", The Art Bulletin, Vol. 83, No. 4 (December 2001), p. 716.

Figure 2. Jean-August Dominique Ingres, The Martyr of Saint Symphorien, 1824

¹³⁹ Andrew Carrington Shelton, “Art, Politics and the Politics of Art: Ingres’s Saint Symphorien at the 1834 Salon”, The Art Bulletin, Vol. 83, No. 4 (December 2001), p. 713.

As I have mentioned above, this art piece has been highly criticized and what many of its critics objected to Saint Symphorien was not the content, politic as it might be, but the form. The main complaint was that Ingres with this “ingrisme” (a highly particularized aesthetic system) “attempted to express his deep disappointment with the official, institutionalized system through which art has been produced and consumed in nineteenth century France”; from the content of this painting everyone understood whatever he or she understood, ranging from an analogy between the Romans’ persecutions of Christians and the Orleanists’ pursuit of the press to an expression of artist’s strangeness and individualism.¹⁴⁰ It worth mentioning that this piece of art was called “Saint Symphorien Affair” and it managed to split the public into two camps: its detractors, “the academics” and its supporters “the romantics”.

However, the point I would like to make is that Ingres’s Saint Symphorien could be regarded as a piece of political-critical art only if we know both the aesthetic and the historical context in which it has been created. More importantly, Ingres promotes his own aesthetic agenda as an opposition gesture, making his art a political one. His painting is political (above all) because of the politics of form and not because of its content. The content speaks about a typical martyrdom which could have been taken place wherever in the world without necessarily making a political or critical point about power mechanisms.

But what the art work looks like, its formal features, its style are a form of criticizing and opposing the established art conventions of the moment. This does not mean that any new style from the history of art emerged as an opposition to the established conventions of art making. Sometimes it did and sometimes it did not. Only a serious knowledge of history and art history (both official and unofficial) will indicate which stylistic innovation has been political and which not. Contrary to the common sense definition of political art (as art with political content) Ingres's example discussed above shows that the attention to the politics of form is not less significant or essential than the focus on the politics of content. Nevertheless, the content of the piece discussed here could also be seen as political or critical (victims vs. victimizers; freedom vs. despotism; religion vs. secularism and so on) but this politics is made visible through form. More importantly, even if content is interpreted by some viewers and art critics as non-political or non-critical but just as conservative and supporting the status quo (in this case, called Catholicism), still form remains critical, political, and revolutionary in the sense that it is the expression of an opposition to academic painting and aesthetics.

¹⁴⁰ For more meanings attributed to the subject of this painting see Andrew Carrington Shelton, “Art, Politics and the Politics of Art: Ingres’s Saint Symphorien at the 1834 Salon”, The Art Bulletin, Vol. 83, No. 4 (December 2001), pp. 711-739.

Ingres system of art making (his style) or his aesthetic program consists in a purposive deprecation of colour and in the concomitant evaluation of line. This formal aspect is obvious in The Martyr of Saint Symphorien too. He proposes the aesthetics of the forceful and meaningful drawing as opposed to the primacy of colour in art making. Saint Symphorien is a work of art in which the line takes priority over the colour, making the piece to look grave and gray like a fresco. Many critics complained the lack of light, reflections and a colour from Ingres's painting (for that period the colour and not the line was the status quo of painting making). Beside the aesthetics of line over colour, there is in his work another significant item which offers support for the idea of a politics of form: the excess. He forced and exaggerated the drawings of many of the characters from Saint Symphorien. What does this exaggeration of form mean?

Here the answer is a matter of dispute¹⁴¹ but whatever it means, the point I want to emphasize is that Ingres exaggerated forms are part of his aesthetic agenda of opposing an aesthetic regime to another. As a matter of fact, form is not just “pure”, it is not the epitomizer of pure art, as so many theorists from formalist tradition use to claim, but it can be political, critical and resistant too. As I have mentioned, there are so many conflicting interpretations regarding the meaning of Ingres’s excess (“musculomania” detectable in the two lictors; the exaggerated pallor of Symphorien etc.). What I would like to clarify is that form could be both political and meaningful without ceasing to be aesthetic. The fact that there are so many conflicting interpretations of Ingres’s excess does not mean that his formal excess is meaningless. The only thing this plurality of interpretations proves is that Saint Symphorien has a complicate meaning and not that it lacks any meaning. Ingres pursued wilfully formal eccentricity as a political gesture of opposition vis a vis of the art making and art distribution from his time.

¹⁴¹ There are many interpretations for Ingres's formal excess. For instance, some argued that "Ingres has sacrificed everything – not simply colour but also aerial and linear perspective, compositional clarity, and even consistency of scale and proportion – to his maniacal desire to show off his drawing"; others pointed out that "in his determination to polarize victims and victimizers, Ingres went so far as to blur conventional distinctions of gender; if the lictors are invested with a kind of overblown virility, then the delicacy of Symphorien verges on the positively effeminate"; while others believed that "The gesture of the other lictor is so tormented, his muscles so contracted, and his expression so tortured, that he seems to be the victim instead of his executioner" (for more interpretations see Andrew Carrington Shelton, "Art, Politics and the Politics of Art: Ingres's Saint Symphorien at the 1834 Salon", The Art Bulletin, Vol. 83, No. 4 (December 2001), pp. 711-739).

The other example of resistant-critical form is from contemporary art: Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army (CIRCA).¹⁴² The clowns refuse the spectacle of celebrity and that is why they cover their identity with make-up and wigs. Their artistic actions include mimicking stupidity and naiveté, mocking capitalist institutions and other clowning strategies based on the aesthetic strategies of excess and exaggeration. They used to answer to the police’s violence with tenderness by hugging them and by kissing their shields. These artists deliberately impersonate a ‘fool’ or a clown as an artistic-political gesture.

Exactly like Ingres’s Saint Symphorien, the artists from Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army pursue wilfully and deliberately formal eccentricity and formal excess as a political gesture of opposition. The content of their performance is not as political and critical as it is the excessive form. Thus, we can talk about both aesthetic and political functions of excess. Excess is a significant feature of camp sensibility and kitsch art performing a considerable number of functions (besides the decorative one). When it is intentional, excess can function as a critical/oppositional strategy directed against the status quo of the moment. This use of excess is as old as the need to transgress the official culture by disobeying its rules, canons and practices by the means of carnival, clowns and festivals.

¹⁴² Originally this was an UK-based art collective, using clowning and non-violent tactics to act against neo-liberalism, corporate-globalization and other imposed norms and political economies from above. Now Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army has active groups in many countries (i.e. Germany, Denmark, Belgium, Ireland, Israel, Denmark, and France).

Figure 3. Clandestine Insurgent Rebel Clown Army; source: <http://beautifultrouble.org/case/clandestine-insurgent-rebel-clown-army/>

This tactic became a valuable approach for Dada, camp style, political concerned artists, and activists. However, not everybody agrees that excess could be a powerful critical and political tool. For some art theorists and critics, excess is just a feature of “bad art”, a lack of skill or a neighbour of the Disgusting. The commonsensical understanding of the excess from the point of view of a traditional aesthetic theory of art stresses the fact that the excessive is an aesthetic flaw. An excessive form is an aesthetic defect because form has to be balanced, harmonious and so on. But obviously this understanding is not accurate as long as we have so many examples of aesthetic excess from contemporary art which function as a critical-parodic device that can be both aesthetically and politically sounded.

In both traditional critical art and in contemporary one, form is political and meaningful but, nevertheless, there are consistent differences between the two in what regards form's fixity in space. The critical artist Dmitry Vilensky (member of the Russian political art collective "What is to be done?") used to argue that in our contemporary culture it is difficult to list the formal aspects of political art, but we could still define them in opposition with those present in commercial art. Hence, form is not just what the work of art looks like, what we directly and immediately perceive and what pleases at the first sight. On the contrary, form is a meaningful instantiation of an idea which can be successfully worked out or not. Moreover, it is not a structure limited to the physical boundaries of the art object but it's a way of constructing the art piece in a principally different and critical manner.

In other words, form is not something which we sense when we encounter visually a piece but a larger "framing" which is intellectual, emotional or both. This larger construction goes beyond the edge of the art object. Actually, contemporary critical art is very seldom described in terms of "work" or even "piece". Contemporary art consumers and theorists deal less with "works of art",¹⁴³ than with interventions (both in public space and in museums), happenings and situations. Then, we may be simplifying things if we could adhere to a view according to which form is not a detachment of appearances converted into "style" that is completely separated from the significance and meaning. Form is a significant structure in political-critical art and a way of constructing meaningfully and differently the art piece/situation/intervention. For example, dancing in unconventional places is a way of constructing or shaping differently the art piece; or re-enacting traditional art masterpieces in an ironical manner; or “open work” in which the spectator intervenes and allows an aesthetics of continuous transformation; or mimicry, poor art, kitsch, self-mutilation, land art (repeated modifications of the ground), computer art and so on.

¹⁴³ Understood as physical objects.

Form in all these examples is not a static, geometric and fix frame (as in traditional art) but it “comes out into space”. This non-fixity of form in contemporary political art makes the piece politically meaningful momentarily, in this context, in this situation and not everlastingly. The criticality of a political art happening, for example, makes sense and may be effective in its initial context or situation and not in the museum, art review or re-constructive diorama. This does not mean that a re-constructed or a documented happening kept in museum is void of meaning. It also has a meaning (not necessarily the initial one) but the grasping of it changes with the changing of the context or situation in which we experience it. In apprehending art as political, form can be as relevant as the content (and in some cases the most relevant element). Both form and content can be apprehended as political within certain spatial and temporal contexts and not independently of them.

2.5. Conclusions

Contrary to many mainstream theories of contemporary art and aesthetics, there is no gap between political-critical art and the aesthetic. The recent widespread dismissal of the aesthetic from political art denounces only a certain understanding of the aesthetic – the purist aesthetic account of art – but, in doing so, unavoidably develops another kind of aesthetics: critical, confrontational and resistant. What I have said thus far should serve to dispel a certain understanding of the aesthetic as purely perceptual (cognitively non- inflected perception). I have argued that an enlarged concept of the aesthetic as non-perceptual appreciation (James Shelley’s) would better accommodate and make room for conceptual, political and other contemporary contested arts. Political-critical art expands non-aesthetic ideas in imaginatively complex ways (and this imaginative combination of ideas makes them aesthetic ideas). The way these ideas are embodied in forms is still crucial for the appreciation of political art as art. The same idea (let's say the idea of social justice) in a different form (in a newspaper's article) might have another, a different meaning and give rise to another kind of experience than when it is embodied in a form as art. Political art is not necessarily an art of content at the expense of form (not even in conceptual art's case). Even the most conceptual piece of political art "makes a liminal aesthetic use of its form... despite having transformed our expectations concerning what counts as artistic form".¹⁴⁴

However, the crucial point this chapter intends to make is not that the aesthetic dimension of political-critical art is connected more with form than with content, but a slightly different one: namely that form is not the depoliticized structure of the art piece while content becomes the aesthetically devaluated political significance of it. I do not want to suggest that form alone accounts for the aesthetic appreciation of a political artwork. Both form and content influence the spectator's aesthetic response since both of them are aesthetically relevant. I have insisted more on the political-aesthetical relevance of form as a response to aesthetic traditions of modernism (Formalism, New Criticism, and so on) which have confined the "aesthetic" to a de-pragmaticized, de-conceptualized and de-politicized form alone. Especially in political art's case form can be critical, resistant, aggressive, wit, courageous or political without ceasing to be aesthetic and to conduct aesthetic experience.

¹⁴⁴ Diarmuid Costello, "Kant After LeWitt: Toward an Aesthetics of Conceptual Art", in Peter Goldie and Elisabeth Schellekens (eds.), Philosophy and Conceptual Art, Oxford University Press, 2007, p. 113.

CHAPTER 3. REVISITING DISINTERESTEDNESS: POLITICAL- CRITICAL ART AND DISINTERESTEDNESS

In this chapter I defend disinterestedness against several influential but mistaken interpretations of it. With this defence, I attempt to prove that disinterestedness is an important component in political-critical art's aesthetic appreciation and we should not get rid of it (as many contemporary voices demand). Before arguing for the great significance of disinterestedness in critical art's appreciation, I firstly attempt to analyze the concept of disinterestedness as such. Why is this important? This conceptual analysis is crucial mostly because contemporary aestheticians, artists and art critics tend to define disinterestedness in purist terms (no interest, no context, no morality, and no engagement). Seen in this light, disinterestedness is understood almost exclusively in the modernist sense which emphasizes the spectatorial detachment as the "prerequisite for pure contemplative experience".¹⁴⁵ Yet, disinterestedness, as I will argue, has nothing to do with that.

Disinterestedness is considered the paradigmatic concept of aesthetics and the hallmark of modernist aesthetics. For the 20th century aestheticians (and, for many contemporary aestheticians, art theorists and art critics), "disinterestedness" means "no concern for any ulterior purpose" (following Jerome Stolnitz's interpretation of it).¹⁴⁶ According to this understanding, we pay attention to art disinterestedly (our attention is not "interested" in what the object may say (or not) or do or if the object has a purpose or not). Stolnitz holds that we cannot have an aesthetic experience of an object, unless we perceive the object in a certain, aesthetic way (with a disinterested, contemplative attitude).¹⁴⁷ Disinterestedness entails (in this purist interpretation), a contemplative attitude which requires detachment, passivity and taking distance from daily problems and concerns when appreciating art. If we accept this established understanding of disinterestedness, political-critical art cannot be aesthetically experienced because the viewer will care about “the ulterior purposes” of this art (the apprehension and the appreciation will be an interested one).

¹⁴⁵ John Andrew Bernstein, "Shaftesbury's Identification of the Good with the Beautiful", Eighteen Century Studies, Vol. 10, No. 3, 1977, p. 308.

¹⁴⁶ Stolnitz claims that there are two kinds of attentions: disinterested attention and interested attention. According to him it is only the disinterested attention which underlines aesthetic perception and which makes ordinary perception aesthetic.

Thus, in this case, we can talk more about an active use of art, rather than a passive response to it. Is then possible to preserve an instance of aesthetic disinterestedness in attending politically concerned art, or we should concede that political-critical art is that type of art which cannot be experienced and appreciated disinterestedly?¹⁴⁸ At the first glance, it seems that political artists are eager to produce a type of art which is intentionally and aggressively directed against “aesthetic disinterestedness” (or at least against the paradigmatic understanding of aesthetic disinterestedness which dominates the official discourse of philosophical aesthetics).¹⁴⁹

But, although in contemporary discourses about art in general, “disinterestedness” has a bad reputation and the contemporary art theorists and critics tend to dismiss it from art appreciation, I claim that we can shed a positive light on interestedness in attending art in general (and political-critical art in particular) without radically displacing the traditional, “obsolete” and contested disinterestedness. This does not mean that all categories of the traditional aesthetics should be preserved for political-critical art appreciation. As I will argue, we need to examine more carefully the various meanings of disinterestedness and only then ¹⁴⁷ For these theorists aesthetic attitude is a necessary condition for aesthetic experience. Aesthetic attitude is an attitude we have to adopt in order to have an aesthetic experience (that attitude consists of suspending all interests, contemplative apprehension and psychological distance).

¹⁴⁸ Once we accept the idea that political-critical art cannot be experienced disinterestedly, we have to concede that political-critical art cannot be experienced aesthetically. This is so because, as I have already stated in the previous chapter, aestheticians of the last two hundred years have relied upon an understanding of the aesthetic which has to do with disinterestedness thesis: an experience of art is aesthetic if it is disinterested.

¹⁴⁹ Political-critical art is many times a transgressive, offensive or violent art, meant to provoke a reaction. It seems to contradict the very idea of “aesthetic disinterestedness”.

we will be in the position to suggest which one is more appropriate and which one is unacceptable in critical art's appreciation. Contemporary philosophers of art (Arnold Berleant or Lucy Lippard) claim that in appreciating art, and especially politically concerned art, engagement rather than disinterestedness is more appropriate. I claim that if we want to consider the contemporary grounds for and the suitability of disinterestedness, the very concept needs to be in the first place re-evaluated and re-visited. In the perspective I will propose, there is no conflict between disinterestedness and engagement (to be disinterested does not mean to passively contemplate an art piece without concern for any ulterior purpose and interests free). Then, my approach takes issue with both a powerful art critical consensus and with a certain, dominant aesthetic theory.¹⁵⁰ I would have to say more on that later on.

Political-critical art is usually understood as that type of art (or arts) which cannot and should not be apprehended in a disinterested manner. This is the contemporary “consensus” on disinterestedness and political art. Yet, there is at least one case, when a contemporary philosopher of art tackles this issue, without trying to completely reject disinterestedness from critical-political art's appreciation. One of the most important (to my knowledge, the only one) contemporary attempts to find a middle ground between an interested and a disinterested apprehending of politically concerned art is undertaken by Peggy Zeglin Brand.¹⁵¹ She holds that she has found a middle ground: we can have both interested and disinterested apprehending of political art with one condition: to switch our attention from a disinterested mode to an interested one (in this way political art is experienced both in an interested and in a disinterested manner).

¹⁵⁰ In other words, I disagree with two categories of theorists: (1) those who claim that political-critical art cannot and should not be apprehended in a disinterested manner, and (2) those who claim that political-critical art can be experienced in a disinterested manner (where disinterestedness means passive contemplation, no interest allowed, and so on). Both categories, mistakenly assume that disinterestedness has to do with “no concern for any ulterior purpose”, “no interest allowed”, a contemplative, aesthetic attitude of disengagement with the world outside of art, and finally with psychological distance.

¹⁵¹ Peggy Zeglin Brand, “Disinterestedness and Political Art”, in Paradoxa, No. 8, November, 1998.

However, I will argue that Brand's account may still be questioned especially because of the difficulties resting exactly in the core of her argument – “the switch of attentions”. She does not offer a viable solution for the disinterested apprehending of politically-charged art because she still reduces disinterestedness to attention and perception (the “switch” between interested (political) and disinterested (aesthetic) attention is the core of her argument).

What I propose instead is a re-thinking of disinterestedness by changing the focus of disinterestedness as a mode of attention to thinking of disinterestedness as a matter of motivations and reasons (on the grounds that our motivations and reasons can be interested or disinterested while the attention cannot be).¹⁵² This understanding of disinterestedness echoes Shaftesbury's (the 18th century understanding of the concept) even if, as I will argue, it is not completely identical with Shaftesbury's. Unlike the 20th century understanding of disinterestedness which eliminates from aesthetic experience all interests (Stolnitz's, Bullough's, Beardsley's Wismatts's), Shaftesbury opposes disinterestedness to a specific type of interests only (like the interest for the sake of a pecuniary bargain).

In the first section of this chapter, I discuss both the traditional (the 18th century) and the modernist (the 20th century) meanings of the term disinterestedness. In the second section, I take issue with those contemporary theorists who reject disinterestedness from political art's appreciation. In the third section, I show how at least cognitive interests cannot be ruled out in disinterested appreciation of art. Section four discusses the idea of “reflective contemplation” (attempting to prove that there is no conflict between “disinterestedness” and “engagement” in political art's aesthetic appreciation). Section five critically evaluates Brand's solution (“the switch of attentions”) in political art's experiencing. In the last section, I argue that political art cannot be experienced in a disinterested manner (as that proposed by Stolnitz or Brand) because to maintain the centrality of a disinterested attention means to sustain the aesthetic attitude which means independence of moral judgments and political judgments. The kind of disinterestedness which seems suitable for political-critical art apprehension is to some extent closer to the 18th century understanding of it (but, as I will show, it is not identical with it). Disinterestedness is not the lack or absence of all interests but it is opposed to pecuniary or selfish interests. Disinterestedness is a “noble” word denoting an ethical attitude (disinterested in taking advantage, profit or achieving some morally questionable ends) and not a privative concept as the absence of all interests. The conclusion will be that it is both possible and recommendable to maintain disinterestedness in apprehending political-critical art.

¹⁵² Robert McGregor holds that attention is primitive, that is, attention does not divide up into different kinds (Robert McGregor, “Art and the Aesthetic”, Journal of Aesthetic and Art Criticism, Summer, 1974, pp. 549-559).

3.1. Disinterestedness in the Light of the Eighteen Century and After

The concept of disinterestedness has a long history in philosophical aesthetics, starting with the Eighteen century. Whatever this concept denotes at different times, a thing is certain: to be disinterested does not mean being indifferent, bored or having lost interest. In a modernist aesthetic understanding (the 20th century’s aesthetics) the concept has come to mean: a special sort of perception or attention (which is different from regular perception or attention), confined exclusively to the perceivable aspects of the aesthetic object, in which all interests are quarantined. This requirement echoes the purist aesthetic account to art. To have an aesthetic experience of an art piece you need to quarantine all interests which could shadow the purity of the aesthetic response. This elimination of all interests is “prerequisite for experiencing aesthetically” an art piece. A disinterested aesthetic response means to pay attention to the art piece for itself, without having in mind another interests or purposes. This kind of “experiencing” is called “aesthetic”.

In order to experience something aesthetically we need firstly to adopt a disinterested aesthetic attitude. What is a disinterested attitude? A disinterested attitude is a detached way of contemplating art in which our attention is focused exclusively on the object of our appreciation without any interests or ulterior purposes. Disinterested attention as part of the aesthetic attitude is something which we should do if we want to experience a piece of art aesthetically. It is an attitude we have to adopt if we are to aesthetically experience something. This understanding of the aesthetic disinterestedness is the most popular interpretation of disinterestedness and it has been used very often as an argument for the aesthetic theories of art (and still is). Aesthetic attitude theorists of the 20th century¹⁵³ have argued that disinterestedness is the prerequisite for any kind of full and correct appreciation of art as art. As we know, disinterestedness is conceptually tied to other terms like: contemplation, aesthetic attitude, psychological distance. Due to its centrality in the aesthetic approach to arts (especially in relation to aesthetic experience), the question of disinterestedness cannot be simply avoided from an approach which attempts to accommodate aesthetically political-critical art. However, as I will argue, this does not mean that we have to understand the concept of disinterestedness in its purist sense (no interest, no ulterior purpose, no emotional involvement, etc.).

The concept of disinterestedness has been developed in the eighteenth century in the writings of Shaftesbury, Addison, Alison, Hume, Burke, Hutcheson, and others from the British school of aesthetics. At that time, disinterestedness has served to identify intrinsic normative experiences.¹⁵⁴ At the beginning, the concept has been used in the moral context in order to distinguish things and actions that were good in themselves, apart from their usefulness. Thus Shaftesbury, one of the fathers of this conception, contrasted “the disinterested love of God”, a love pursued for its own sake, with the more common motive of serving God “for interest merely”. The disinterested love of God has then value that is entirely intrinsic.¹⁵⁵ Let us keep in mind this first understanding of disinterestedness offered by Shaftesbury. Even if this is just the historical background of the concept of disinterestedness, it is nevertheless crucial for the argument I want to put forth here. I am interested in the initial understanding of disinterestedness upon which aesthetic theory has developed lately, because this initial understanding of disinterestedness in relation to art appreciation is more appropriate for an aesthetic appreciation of political-critical art than the 20th century aesthetic theories of disinterestedness. When Shaftesbury tackles this conception of disinterestedness, he integrates it in the sphere of art as well, talking of “the morality of art appreciation”. We have to keep in mind that disinterestedness, as the key concept in aesthetics has its origins in ethics and religion. A first conclusion will be that the concept of disinterestedness, in its first usage has nothing to do with disinterested contemplation of art (as some contemporary aestheticians claim), on the contrary: Shaftesbury does not separate the contemplation of art (aesthetic) from moral concerns in particular.

¹⁵³ Especially Jerome Stolnitz, Eliseo Vivas, Edward Bullough, Francis Coleman, and Veron Lee.

¹⁵⁴ An intrinsic normative experience is that experience of immanent value. An immanent value cannot be used in order to achieve something else because it doesn't have exchange value. For example the love of God is for some people an intrinsic value pursued just for the sake of it, without expecting any recompense in exchange (like the afterlife, sanctify, etc.).

The next step in aesthetic disinterestedness’s history is the “refinement” it received through Kant and Schopenhauer’s treatment. For the former, disinterestedness is the first moment of the judgment of taste from which he claims the universality of aesthetic judgment of beauty and, for the second disinterestedness is “pure, will-less contemplation”, “no interest allowed”.¹⁵⁶ In the 20th century, Jerome Stolnitz engages again in the theory of aesthetic disinterestedness dealing with both the origins of aesthetic disinterestedness and with “aesthetic attitude” (a version of aesthetic disinterestedness, which according to the attitude theorist is a necessary condition for aesthetic experience). These theoretical considerations have become the hallmark of modernist aesthetics and its core arguments are still hunting the contemporary aestheticians. The main “usefulness” attributed to aesthetic disinterestedness in the form it has been conceptualized by Stolnitz, is that it helps in discriminating aesthetic from non-aesthetic experiences and art from non-art. If this is so or not I will discuss in the next sections. For the moment it worth mentioning, that Stolnitz fails to account for a correct origin of the aesthetic disinterestedness as he understands it (as “no interest allowed in art appreciation” and “no concern for any ulterior purpose”).¹⁵⁷

¹⁵⁵ See Arnold Berleant and Ronald Hepburn, “An Exchange on Disinterestedness”, in Contemporary Aesthetics, Vol. 1, 2003, source: <http://www.contempaesthetics.org/newvolume/pages/article.php?articleID=209> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

¹⁵⁶ Schopenhauer, for example, greatly admired Dutch interior paintings, but stipulated that they should be of flowers rather than food, complaining that realistic depiction of herrings and the like made him feel hungry and thereby disrupted the purity of his response - see Norman Kreitman, “The Varieties of Aesthetic Disinterestedness”, in Contemporary Aesthetics, Vol. 6, 2006, source: <http://www.contempaesthetics.org/newvolume/pages/article.php?articleID=390> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

He assumes that Shaftesbury was the first philosopher to liberate aesthetic appreciation from moral or political concerns. I think that we have strong reasons and historical evidences to doubt these claims. If the historian Preben Mortensen is right, then Stolnitz’s claim that Shaftesbury liberates the aesthetic from the moral is erroneous.¹⁵⁸ Mortensen researched Shaftesbury’s writings and offered pieces of textual evidence from Shaftesbury’s work The Moralists, to sustain that “Shaftesbury’s aim was to situate the contemplation of art within a morality acceptable to his contemporaries”.¹⁵⁹ We can understand this claim if we take into account the fact that Shaftesbury paid a lot of attention to the movement of reforming the manners, a movement which appeared after the 1688 English Revolution.

The idea was to introduce new behavioural ideals among the gentleman, a sort of Bildungsideal according to which horsemanship, swordsmanship, duelling and other activities related to the traditional conception of honour should be replaced with “new behaviours” such as “manners” and especially “politeness”. Politeness had to incorporate, in England of that time, two ingredients: the possession of taste and a high interest in arts. For Shaftesbury, ¹⁵⁷ Jerome Stolnitz, “On the Origins of Aesthetic Disinterestedness”, in Aesthetics: A Critical Anthology, George Dickie and Richard J. Sclafani (eds.), St Martin’s Press, New York, 1977.

¹⁵⁸ Ibidem.

¹⁵⁹ Preben Mortensen, “Shaftesbury and the Morality of Art Appreciation”, Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 55, No. 4. (Oct. 1994), p. 631.

morality and manners could not be separated, and the content of his moral-aesthetic view should be understood in the light of this Bildungsideal. Finally, Shaftsbury opposes “disinterestedness” to a specific type of interests: the interest for the sake of a bargain or, in Shaftsbury’s words, “we call interested pleasure: riches, power and other exterior advantages”.¹⁶⁰ This is the 18th century understanding of disinterestedness.

The term disinterestedness applied to beauty (art) in Shaftsbury’s conception is very close, as meaning, with the disinterested love of virtue and God. But, as Mortensen suggests and I agree with, Stolnitz applies the term “aesthetic” in the modern sense, as an autonomous experience – “in which it refers to something which is independent of, for example, morality or religion”,¹⁶¹ and he attributes this meaning to Shaftsbury’s concept of disinterestedness. But this is a mistake. Shaftsbury’s argument goes in the opposite direction. He does not separate the contemplation of beauty from the sphere of morality but, as Mortensen points out, “he wants to assert that there is a moral way of admiring things, a way which is not to be identified with luxury, covetousness, avarice, ostentation, and similar – to Shaftsbury and most of his contemporaries – immoral qualities”.¹⁶² Therefore, for both Lord Shaftsbury and for contemporary political art’s public, disinterestedness is not a category which takes aesthetic contemplation beyond the sphere of morality – but one that situates it exactly within the realm of morality.

Unlike Shaftsbury, Stolnitz holds that the moral aspects and the aesthetic aspects of art are completely separate aspects which require different ways of appreciation. For them, the aesthetic experience of art is an autonomous experience (it has nothing to do with politics or morality) and in order to have this experience the spectator should adopt a disinterested stance (they call it “attitude”). For the modern philosopher of art, disinterested appreciation of art is a requirement which makes aesthetic experience an autonomous experience (a “pure” experience of an object perceived just for the sake of it, outside of any use or purpose). But as Mortensen has argued, the “disinterestedness discourse” about art appreciation as an autonomous enterprise is not apolitical. This particular discourse gained cultural hegemony in the beginning of the 20th century. The requirement of disinterested contemplation/appreciation of art actually contains social and political beliefs (cultural hegemony’s political beliefs). Then, the appreciation of the right kind of art “in the appropriate manner (disinterestedly) become(s) a requirement for and a sign of membership in cultural elite”.¹⁶³ In other words, there is a cultural politics and an ideology toward which this purist understanding of disinterested contemplation amounts.

¹⁶⁰ Preben Mortensen, “Shaftesbury and the Morality of Art Appreciation”, Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 55, No. 4. (Oct. 1994), p. 631.

¹⁶¹ Idem, p. 635.

¹⁶² Idem, p. 637.

3.2. Is Disinterestedness Any Longer an Operational Term for Contemporary Aesthetics and Art Theory?

In contemporary art theory, disinterestedness has a bad reputation. Many times it is considered a modernist term having to do with detachment and contemplation which cannot be accepted in contemporary art’s apprehending and theorizing. It is argued that achieving a disinterested state of mind is not possible. Many theorists ask if: Is there any kind of disinterestedness possible at all? As we can see, the common attitude toward disinterestedness is a critical one, especially reinforced by Pierre Bourdieu’s influential rejection of disinterestedness from his theory of action. He posits that human beings cannot act without a sufficient reason (without interests). In an “ethics of generosity”, the disinterested act is just a fairy tale since there is always an interest promoting the disinterested-generous disposition. In other words, for Bourdieu, we have some interests when we pursue disinterestedness. Even behind the act which appears to be the most disinterested action rests an interest for a form of symbolic capital (symbolic profit). For example, the holy man's disinterested actions are in fact motivated by a symbolic form of profit: the achievement of sanctity, the afterlife's recompense and so on. There is always a form or another of intentional and purposeful disinterestedness among all human actions. Hence, Shaftsbury's "disinterested love of God" and "gentlemen's disinterested politeness" would be regarded just as chimeras from Bourdieu's perspective. The so-called "disinterested generosity" in an aristocratic context is in fact motivated by a social norm, like noblesse oblige. You are not generous for the sake of being generous but because you are a noble man and you have to prove it. Bourdieu's conclusion is that the social and aesthetic contexts in which disinterestedness becomes the official norm are not activated by disinterestedness but on the contrary.

¹⁶³ Preben Mortensen, Art in the Social Order: The Making of the Modern Concept of Art, State University of New York, 2003, p. 174.

Contemporary art, with its elements of shock, trasgresivity, abjection, repulsion, violence and cruelty seems to pose substantial challenges to disinterestedness by constantly menacing the emotionally and ethically distanced perspective associated with aesthetic disinterestedness (officially understood as detachment and "no interest allowed"). By deliberately provoking visceral reactions, many contemporary art pieces obstinately refuse to be integrated to the disinterested mode of apprehension. On the contrary, they demand visceral reactions and acute moral deliberation. For many contemporary philosophers of art (Danto, Berleant, Shusterman, Dickie), disinterested contemplation has become an academic relic incapable to account for the new forms of art emerging with the advance of technology. Our visual experience has become more and more multifaceted: a piece of art can be now multiplied, re-enacted, re-activated with the help of the computer or re-thought and the aesthetic object is often pulverized and converted in aesthetic situations which are context-dependent and more or less ephemeral. In these new situations it is difficult to be detached and contemplative and to bracket all interests.

I don't know if a disinterested attitude (in the sense of that described by Stolnitz) may have been appropriate to eighteenth-century art (most probably not) but, nevertheless, the sort of cognitive, emotional and bodily involvement the contemporary arts require from their attendants make the disinterested aesthetic attitude a troubled notion. To maintain a disinterested mode of experiencing art in the 20th century fashion, would mean to miss the point of many contemporary critical art productions and practices whose focal purpose is to create a participatory situation in which the art event is the result of the direct interaction between artist and public. Nicolas Bourriaud's "relational aesthetics"¹⁶⁴ is just one single example of this sort. In this "new" aesthetics, the art-object-process-practice is experienced in an aesthetic situation (the emphasis is removed from the aesthetic object alone). Not only is the aesthetic object de-emphasized in this new aesthetics but also the very idea of spectatorship. The viewer-spectator is no longer a spectator (in the sense of a passive/contemplative receiver) but an active participant who learns, imagines, reacts to things instead of being captured by the images' apparent surfaces.

However, in spite of all these rejections of aesthetic disinterestedness, I claim that it is possible to assess contemporary grounds and suitability for disinterestedness if we revise its modernist understanding. Disinterestedness is not a separate/special sort of experience (as it has been argued). By the same token, attention and perception cannot be divided in special (aesthetic) and regular (non-aesthetic). The same kind of perception acknowledges both the existence of "Mona Lisa" and a cabbage. There are no special perceptual eyeglasses through which we see "Mona Lisa" as a beautiful/aesthetic piece of art. If we regard "Mona Lisa" as a beautiful, aesthetic art piece is because we know it is art (or "great art") and not because we pay a special sort of attention/perception to it.

¹⁶⁴ Nicolas Bourriaud, "Relational Aesthetics", Les Presses du Reel, 1998.

Yet, even if there is no special (aesthetic) perception or attention, there is a sort of “standing back” even when we appreciate relational/collaboration art,¹⁶⁵ but the question is: what exactly is this “standing back”? For sure, we regard art in a certain way, which differs from the way we regard everyday objects. We see and appreciate “Mona Lisa” with certain awareness that what we see is a piece of art and not a cabbage. Why is this so? The answer is that gaze is educated to see art in this manner and not that aesthetic perception is a special kind of perception (different from average perception). We don’t just see something as aesthetic (or art) but we see something as aesthetic if our gaze is educated to see that way.

The first conclusion is that aesthetic disinterestedness, in the way in which it has been theorized by the 20th century aestheticians (and also in contemporary pronouncements) is not a plausible concept for contemporary aesthetic evaluation of art. I will explain why I think this is so in what follows.

3.3. Cognitive Interests Cannot Be Ruled Out by “Aesthetic” Disinterestedness

The 20th century understanding of the concept of disinterestedness in aesthetic theory is that disinterestedness means no concern for any ulterior purpose and no interest allowed in art appreciation. This is the paradigmatic sense in which disinterestedness is understood in Western aesthetic theory. Stolnitz makes this point clear when he claims that “we cannot understand modern aesthetic theory unless we understand the concept of disinterestedness”.¹⁶⁶ In my view he misread it and unfortunately his misinterpretation was not without negative consequences for aesthetics and art theory. The way in which the concept of disinterestedness is understood in the philosophical tradition of modernity has led to a ¹⁶⁵ Relational art is that art which takes as its point of departure the whole of human relations and social contexts. Usually it is a collaborative art practice in the sense that the art piece is the result of the interaction between artist and public.

¹⁶⁶ Jerome Stolnitz, “On the Origins of Aesthetic Disinterestedness”, in George Dickie and Richard J. Sclafani (eds.), Aesthetics: A Critical Anthology, St. Martin’s Press, New York, 1977.

consensus in Western aesthetic theories of art that art is something which has nothing to do with use and purpose.

My claim is that some interests have to be ruled out by aesthetic disinterestedness but not all interests. We can shed a positive light on interestedness in attending art in general (and political-critical art in particular), without radically displacing the 18th century, old-fashioned disinterestedness. Some interests (like the cognitive one) cannot be removed from aesthetic experience and appreciation of art because these interests will always foreground our aesthetic experience and appreciation. We cannot simply impose on us to achieve such a state (disinterested attitude) as a necessary condition for experiencing aesthetically something. At the same time, disinterestedness is not a privative concept but an ethical one; to be disinterested does not mean to rule out all interests but something considerably different, namely: to rule out some of our wants (those having to do with personal or selfish advantage, bargain, public recognition and so on).

Among others, Jerome Stolnitz is well-known for his anti-cognitive approach of aesthetic experience and appreciation. His purist aestheticism and autonomist understanding of art and aesthetics, forbid both the cognitive and the ethical stance in the disinterested apprehension of art. As an aesthetic attitude's defender, he would say that in order to have an aesthetic attendance of the artwork we should suspend all the "curiosities" and to concentrate our attention only on the purely formal qualities of art. Failing to do so would mean failing to aesthetically experience the artwork. I am afraid that this is not possible (i.e., elimination of all interests, expectations, beliefs, hopes etc). Involuntarily, our "eye" will safeguard some "curiosities". Robert L. Solso, makes a very interesting claim in his Cognition and the Visual Arts, sustaining that art and cognition have always stood as two "convex mirrors each reflecting and amplifying the other".¹⁶⁷ A further interesting claim is that we see both with the brain and with the eye. This means that our visual perception is not limited to sensory, but involves the observer's cognitive background, which confers meaning to such experience. More accurately put it: "seeing is accomplished through both the visual stimulation of eye and the interpretation of sensory signals by the brain".¹⁶⁸ Solso continues his line of argument by saying that this dual nature of seeing helps us in everyday life to move around in a three-dimensional world without getting killed by cars. If I move the discussion in the direction of visual arts (and I think that this analogy will function in the case of non-visual arts as well), I believe that this association of "seeing" and "understanding" is unavoidable, both in enjoying and in grasping the meaning of the artworks.

¹⁶⁷ Robert L. Solso, Cognition and the Visual Arts, MIT Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts and London, 1994, p. 1.

Our eyes think, so to speak. I am perfectly aware of the fact that our "cognitive perception" is not exactly the same thing with what Stolnitz calls "cognitive interest" (when he suggests that we should not be interested in gaining knowledge about an object, he is basically saying that, in order to experience an object aesthetically and to enjoy it, the disinterested attitude is necessary for achieving and keeping the pure feeling and perception of it). I understand that this disinterested attitude is needed for the pure aesthetic experience, but then, the question will be: Is it possible at all to reach it, as long as our perception is cognitive in its nature?

The conclusion is that beauty, ugliness or elegance of art is more in the mind than in the eyes of the beholder – or, as Solso puts it: "we think art as much as, no, even more than, we see art".¹⁶⁹ So, even if we want to follow Stolnitz's requirement to suspend any "interest in gaining knowledge about an object" when we perceive it aesthetically, we would still not be able to reach this state of mind, because of the way in which our perception functions, involuntarily bringing into reception some cognitive elements. So, "on the surface we appreciate art, literature, music, ideas, and science, but at the core, we see our own mind unveiled in this wonderful stuff’.¹⁷⁰ More accurately put it, to understand what makes a piece of art beautiful, scary, sublime, neutral or elegant to us entails an understanding of what makes us think that the piece of art is beautiful, scary, sublime, neutral or elegant.

¹⁶⁸*Idem*, p. 4.

¹⁶⁹Robert L. Solso, Cognition and the Visual Arts, MIT Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts and London, 1994, p. 4.

The aesthetic experience entails, nevertheless a communication between the art piece and human mind (as well as: emotions, moods, idiosyncrasies, convictions, believes, prejudices, personal history and so on). Our responses to art are not context independent and disinterested in the senses of “no-interest allowed”. On the contrary, we don’t respond to a work of art in the same way every time we look at it. A painting that one day seems to express wit and drollness may appear boring and childish the next day. The experiential context and our interests influence our appreciation of art, our use of art and so on. The immaculate perception is a myth while the aesthetic grasping is a very complex enterprise containing: semantic and allegorical aspects, historical, art historical, societal, everyday or political dimensions – and, of course, emotional, imaginative and philosophical (reflective) experiences too. To just perceive a piece in itself is to entirely miss whatever art means. In political art’s case a perception which rules out a cognitive awareness of social conditions is not helpful and it misses the point of this art’s relevance.

Having a cognitive interest is a necessary condition of appreciating the art piece without undermining or discharging disinterestedness. A cognitive interest is the interest in knowing of what the work is about. Knowing of what the work is about entails several cognitive activities like interpreting, labelling, recognizing or associating. All these activities go beyond the merely attending and cannot be overlooked if we want to appreciate art as art. Moreover, having a cognitive interest of what the work is about lies always within the art historical context and not outside and independent of all art historical factors.¹⁷¹ For the naïve

¹⁷⁰ Idem, p. 7.

¹⁷¹ Arthur Danto is right to insist that we cannot make sense of the work itself without at least partially knowing the artistic vocabulary of the artist, the issues the piece talks about and so on (Arthur Danto, The Transfiguration of the Commonplace, Harvard University Press, 1983) viewer this requirement may sound not that pleasant but unfortunately, there is no way to identify the aesthetic properties which belong to the art piece without knowing what the artwork is about in the first place. I cannot imagine a situation in which a spectator claims that he does not know what the art piece is about but he finds it beautiful and moving anyway. If these situations exist (maybe my imagination is limited) then that spectator misses the point of art. We have to know what the art piece is about, to be interested in its “aboutness” and only then we can have a disinterested apprehension of it.

3.4. Disinterestedness and Engagement: Reflective Contemplation

I started this chapter with the claim that there is no conflict between disinterestedness and engagement. Now, I attempt to make this claim clear. As already mentioned, disinterestedness is customarily understood in aesthetic theories of art as entailing no interest in the object of appreciation (in terms of what is the object good for), detached appreciation, contemplative attitude, psychological distance and so on. Disinterested contemplation is one of the requirements for apprehending aesthetically artworks. But even if we contemplate aesthetically a piece of art, this contemplation is not a detached, distracted or passive appreciation. Contemplation can be a disinterested one without being at the same time a “blank cow-like stare” (inactive and a cognitively non-infected perception).

When we experience political-critical art by contemplating it, this aesthetic contemplation requires both an involvement/engagement with and a detachment from the piece. Contemplation leaves room for an imaginative participation in the work’s nature and meaning. When we contemplate something this contemplation is not a passive one and it already involves our personal background (cognitive, political, or emotional). In other words, a disinterested contemplation does not require setting aside who we are. Even if the term “active contemplation” seems to be, at the first sight, an oxymoronic construction, we can accept the fact that contemplation is something one does rather than something which simply happens to one. Diane Collinson calls our attention suggesting that we should question the assumption taken for granted according to which contemplation is passive: “It is arguable that contemplation does not necessary require stillness, that movement is sometimes essential to it, and that stillness does not imply passivity... One needs to move around a sculpture, seeing it to and from distance, looking at it in different angles”.¹⁷² I will take Collinson’s suggestion as a starting point in trying to figure out how an “active contemplation” works in attending political art. My contention is that a reflective, “active contemplation” might be accommodated by political art’s public – but an attitude of contemplative detachment is not appropriate at all. It is one thing to attend contemplatively detached a painting which represents flowers and is about ‘flowers’, and it is quite another to experience Goya’s What more can one do? (from the series The Disasters of War) in the same detached manner. I admit that some art might be just functionless art (or, at least, art without a direct function) or art with the function to decorate a place or to function as a commodity. All these, are examples of art which does not have a critical function (apolitical art). The point I intend to make is that the concept of aesthetic disinterestedness (understood as ‘no ulterior purpose or function’ and ‘no interest allowed’) cannot be accommodated by apolitical art either because any response to art is, as Gadamer puts it, a mode of ‘self-understanding” and not a detached apprehension. Yet, apolitical art does not necessarily require a disinterested apprehension that is opposed to pecuniary or selfish or other ethically questionable interests (as critical art is) because the function of apolitical art is not to make the public aware about social or economical injustices.

¹⁷² Diane Collinson, ‘Aesthetic Experience’, in Oswald Hanfling (ed.) Philosophical Aesthetics, Blackwell, Oxford and Cambridge, 1992, p. 132.

If I attend, say, the series of art pieces called Abu Ghraib, painted by the Columbian artist Fernando Botero, what is the appropriate attitude I have to adopt in front of them? These series of over 80 ravishing paintings and drawings depict prisoners' abuse by American guards at Abu Ghraib, in Iraq. The paintings are made in Botero's cartoonish style: prisoners and guardians are pneumatic oversized figures and the colours used to depict them are really vibrant. But what makes this series powerful is the manner in which Botero visualized "what really happened there", in that prison. The prisoners are vomiting, bleeding, screaming. There are paintings representing dogs which are used to intimidate prisoners. The violence represented in these paintings is so extreme. When I attend these pieces of art I cannot say that my contemplation is still and passive. I cannot say that all interests (especially the cognitive one) are suspended either. My contemplation is active, in the sense that it maintains a dialogue with what is perceived. Through reflective contemplation I am "transported" into the world of infamous torture, which is not only in Botero's paintings, but also in the world out there. I have an "interest" to understand this world. This interest is neither an imposed obligation, nor a private one in the sense of a desire to poses something – but it is an interest motivated by the will to know how awful, how inhuman and how horrific torture can be. Contemplation is not a still and passive stance of an emptied mind but it is more a reflective state. Then, disinterested contemplation is not a disengagement from our cognitive, social or political background. On the contrary, it involves an active use of our capacities (imagination, understanding, personal associations and idiosyncrasies). There is no conflict between disinterested contemplation and engagement if we understand contemplation as a reflective and active process.

The question will be in this case: why is this contemplation disinterested? It is disinterested in the sense that it leaves aside those interests in the object which have to do with using that object to bring us some profit (either financial or some personal recognition).

Emily Brady claims that disinterested contemplation need not be detached from self (does not require setting aside who we are) but only what we want.¹⁷³ Yet, what we want is not always directed toward attaining a profit (financial or symbolic profit) but it can be the case that we want to pursue an intrinsic value when we contemplate art (like the value of being just or caring). The point is that disinterestedness means not being self-interested (to use the art piece as a mean to achieve some profit for yourself, to satisfy your desires or to use the artwork in an immoral way which could justify a morally questionable behaviour). This does not mean that our disinterested contemplation is dis-engaged from our experiential background (including historical, cultural, political and social background).

3.5. Is there any Disinterestedness Suitable for Political-Critical Art's Spectator?

In contemporary art theory and philosophy of art, the tendency is to reject aesthetic disinterestedness from political-critical art's appreciation. Political-critical art is many times transgressive and offensive and a disinterested appreciation seems for some theorists impossible (and for others, inappropriate): Orlan butchers herself with the help of plastic surgery; Oleg Kulik (the artist-dog) lives for two weeks like a dog in an art gallery, being naked, chained, and barking; Maurizio Cattelan produces a satirical sculpture depicting pope John Paul II struck down by a meteorite; Santiago Sierra's film "Los Penetrados" features a mirrored collection with ten geometrically arranged blankets positioned on the floor, on which the various possible combinations of black and white and male and female, engage in anal penetration. Yet, in spite of these disturbing challenges posed by critical art, I argue that it is possible and advisable to experience it disinterestedly. There is another contemporary attempt to show that political art can be appreciated disinterestedly (Brand's) but, as I will show in what follows, this attempt is not an appropriate one.

¹⁷³ Form more on disinterestedness see Emily Brady, "Don't Eat the Daisies: Disinterestedness and Situated Aesthetics", in Environmental Values, No. 7, 1998, pp. 97-114.

Peggy Zeglin Brand holds that the transgressive artistic impulse from political art, however grotesque, offending and repugnant it may appear prima facie, can be tamed for disinterested contemplation.¹⁷⁴ Brand's contemporary defence of aesthetic disinterestedness is worthy since the general theoretical atmosphere is of rejection. Yet, on the other hand, her argument is not convincing, precisely because she does not defend the aesthetic disinterested appreciation of political art but the aesthetic disinterested attitude a viewer has to adopt. The difference between my account on disinterestedness in political art's case and Brand's rests in the way we understand disinterestedness. For Brand it is a matter of attention and aesthetic attitude, while for me disinterestedness has to do with motivations and reasons and, as I will argue in what follows, aesthetic attitude is not enough as a description of what counts as disinterestedness. Her position is incompatible with both traditionalist aesthetic theories of disinterestedness (the 18th century) and with the feminist critics of aesthetic tradition but is compatible (if not even identical) with attitude theorist's, while mine is incompatible only with aesthetic attitude theories.

Generally, contemporary art theorists hold that political-critical art should not be apprehended in accordance with the requirements of aesthetic disinterestedness on the grounds that this art requires engagement rather than passive, "disinterested" contemplation. Yet, against this theoretical background, Brand argues that a disinterested stance in apprehending political art is "not only possible but also advisable" (but she does not tell us why). She proposes an interesting theory¹⁷⁵ according to which we should switch between an interested and a disinterested mode of attention when we experience political art. She meticulously describes how exactly this switch is possible. The core of Brand's argument, namely what she calls the “switch of attentions” recommends both interested and disinterested attention in experiencing political art. She does not say, like her feminist aestheticians colleagues,¹⁷⁶ that “interestedness” should replace the obsolete aesthetic disinterestedness in attending political art. For her, we can attend political art both interestedly and disinterestedly if we switch the attention from an interested mode of attention to a disinterested one. This “switch” between the two modes of attention might be, according to her, deliberate or not. As a conclusion, she states that one cannot “see” with both types of attention at once. In other words, one either experiences the political art piece with interested attention or with disinterested attention but not with both “modes” of attention at the same time. Brand uses the example of the duck-rabbit to support her argument (the well-known duck-rabbit optical illusion from Wittgenstein’s Philosophical Investigations). Sometimes we can see the drawing as a duck and after few seconds only, we can see it as a rabbit. Brand suggests that in an analogous way we can switch from interested to disinterested attention and vice versa when we attend to political art pieces.

¹⁷⁴ Peggy Zeglin Brand, "Disinterestedness and Political Art", in Paradoxa, No. 8, November, 1998.

¹⁷⁵ Drawing on Wittgenstein's aspect seeing: namely, using the duck-rabbit drawing.

Her case study (her “duck-rabbit”) is the political art piece “Omnipresence” performed by Orlan. Brand assumes that Orlan’s piece of art can be looked at exactly in the way we look at the duck-rabbit drawing: switching back and forth between seeing it in an interested mode and a disinterested one (exactly like we switch back and forth between seeing the duck and seeing the rabbit from the duck-rabbit drawing). Orlan’s “Omnipresence” is a highly disturbing piece of critical art in which the artist is surgically rearranging her face in accordance with the canons of classical beauty. One of the critical points this piece makes is that the hegemonic model of beauty is evil and oppressive to women.¹⁷⁷

¹⁷⁶ Brand is a feminist aesthetician who does not reject disinterestedness from aesthetic appreciation of art. Unlike Brand, some other feminist aestheticians question the ideal of disinterested appreciation of art and nature. For example, Hilde Hein posits: “the concepts we reject are not just passé or irrelevant to feminism but are deeply implicated with a system of gender theory that is dysfunctional and repressive of women. The doctrine of disinterestedness is a case in point” (Hilde Hein, ‘Refining Feminist Theory. Lessons from Aesthetics’, in Hilde Hein and Carolyn Korsmeyer (eds.), “Aesthetics in Feminist Perspective”, Hypatia Inc., 1993, p. 10).

Figure 4: Orlan's Omnipresence, 1993, source:
<http://oldsite.english.ucsb.edu/faculty/ecook/courses/eng114em/surgeries>.

Brand recommends how we should appreciate political art in general (and Orlan's in particular)¹⁷⁸ and this obligation reminds us the purist aesthetic demands required by the attitude theorists, strict formalists and autonomists. In other words, this argument says that a political art piece cannot be appreciated both aesthetically and politically or morally at the same time. The "switch of attentions" (from disinterested to interested and vice versa) shows us that we can have both an aesthetic appreciation (disinterested) of art and a political

¹⁷⁷ Actually, this is not the only critical point this piece intends to make. Unlike political-propaganda art, critical-political art is politically polyvalent. The critical points can be considered to be the refusal of hegemonic canon of beauty, the critique of medium specificity and purity (Orlan is combining video art with performance, happening, etc.), and the critique of the male gaze. There is no single criticism.

¹⁷⁸ Kieran Cashell makes a similar observation: "there is a subtle but not an imperceptible shift in her analysis from a description of a situation in contemporary art practice to the prescription of how we ought to experience such situation" (Kieran Cashell, Aftershock: The Ethics of Contemporary Transgressive Art, London-New York: I. B. Tauris & Co. Ltd., 2009, p. 10).

(interested) appreciation but not simultaneously. In fact, what is Brand arguing for is a separation between two modes of attention (disinterested and interested). In the disinterested mode (or, more exactly, what she calls “disinterested” mode) we pay attention only to the intrinsic properties of the work (in Orlan’s case we pay attention to shapes, colours, texture), while in the interested mode, we pay attention to the extrinsic proprieties of the piece of art (like who the artist is, why is she doing this to her, the feminist art features to be found in the piece and so on).

Now that I have presented and explained Peggy Zeglin Brand’s position, I will formulate what I consider the strongest objections to her view on aesthetic disinterestedness. I don’t find this solution particularly convincing on many grounds but, before going into details, I point out that our experiences, the decisions we make, and appreciations of the world we live in (art included) don’t typically come in separate packages (aesthetic, political, moral). As Marcia Eaton would say, “we don’t look to the world first from one and then from another standpoint. I do not claim that aesthetic experiences or considerations are never separable from other sorts. What I insist is that it is not a requirement of the aesthetic that all other interests or concerns are blocked off or out”.¹⁷⁹ Brand’s account can be questioned on several grounds.

Firstly, let’s suppose for the sake of the argument that attention can be switched into two modes: interested and disinterested. However, even if we credit the idea of aesthetic disinterestedness as a matter of attention, the ‘switch of attentions’ in political art’s case is not realistic. The duck-rabbit drawing (or any other similar ambiguous drawing) does not equalize the complexity of an artwork like Orlan’s. The switch between interested and disinterested attention (if there exist such things as interested and disinterested attention) would be possible only in the case of ambiguous situations such as “neither duck nor rabbit” or “neither x nor z” situations. Brand claims that sometimes the switch is involuntarily, in spite of the attempt to focus on the duck or the rabbit exclusively. But if we are to push the analogy with the switch between interestedness and disinterestedness further on, we can observe that in political art's case (even in Orlan's performance) the "switch" is far from being an "involuntary" one. In political art's case the "switch" Brand is talking about is not so easily possible because political artworks offer us very powerful experiences in which the viewer is really mesmerized, shocked or disturbed. The spectator is not a schizophrenic or a non-emotional being who changes the way of looking involuntarily.

¹⁷⁹ Marcia Muelder Eaton, Merit, Aesthetic and Ethical, New York: Oxford University Press, 2001, p. 62.

Secondly – and more importantly – it makes no sense to divide attention into interested and disinterested (let aside whether you can switch them or not). As Robert McGregor points out, in the language of philosophy of mind, "attention is usually taken to be a primitive, not to be defined by means of other terms, and not to be split up into different kinds".¹⁸⁰ By reducing disinterestedness to attention, Brand remains in the same theoretical boat with Jerome Stolnitz and the aesthetic attitude theorists. What Brand fails to note is that attention paid to Orlan's piece is just attention (voluntary or involuntary) but not interested and disinterested. It does not make sense to talk of attention qua attention as interested or disinterested. The purposes and the motivational factors of the viewer can be interested or disinterested and not her attention. Brand is still stuck in a paradigm which does not distinguish between motivations for perceiving with the way of perceiving. Motivations for perceiving art in a certain way can be interested or disinterested but not the way we perceive art.

At the same time, the motivation for perceiving something will always influence the way we perceive that something. Brand's "switch of attentions" model of explaining disinterestedness in political art's case does not work in the case of art which is ephemeral (if art is ephemeral there is no switching back and forth between seeing it disinterestedly and then interestedly). In the best case, it could work for static political-critical art (sculpture, painting) but even then attention alone cannot count as a disinterested stance.

¹⁸⁰ Robert McGregor, "Art and the Aesthetic", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 32, No. 4, 1974, p. 551.

Someone could ask if a misogynist's apprehension, who views Orlan's work from his viewpoint, counts as an immoral, selfish, bad motivation. And, if so, how does it differ from a feminist who looks at Orlan's work from her feminist point of view? If the feminist's viewpoint and motivations are accepted as disinterested then the misogynist's viewpoint should also be accepted because it is not as if he is gaining a personal benefit from appreciating Orlan's work. The answers to these queries will be that ethical motivations are not separated from the aesthetic ones when political art is apprehended. Orlan's piece is certainly political and typically it ensures the right kind of political engagement. I don't think that a misogynist will be willing to attend to feminist art, but even if we concede that he might be attending his apprehension cannot count as a disinterested one even when he is not motivated to apprehend Orlan's piece for gaining personal profit. Misogyny manifests as hatred, discrimination or violence against women. Therefore, a misogynist apprehending of feminist art would be prompted by his evil interests and motivations which will ensure the wrong kind of political engagement (hegemonic politics). For the feminist public, Orlan's performance is both "good" and "truly beautiful" (because it tells the truth about women's struggle for loveliness, prettiness and other superficial "beauties"). As Bernstein posits, both the good and the beautiful require disinterestedness to be valued: "the terms sometimes change, but the idea that the experience of beauty involves transcendence of the evils of self-interested individuality remains the same".¹⁸¹ A misogynist's apprehension does not transcend all the evils to count as disinterested.

¹⁸¹ John Andrew Bernstein, "Shaftesbury's Identification of the Good with the Beautiful", Eighteenth Century Studies, Vol. 10, No. 3, 1977, p. 309.

Orlan's political objective (among others) is meant to distress and to make the attendant say "this is wrong, there is no perfect, universal formal beauty!" But this ethical reaction to her art does not inhabit in the disinterested stance envisaged by Brand's theory but on the contrary. Perhaps, a defender of aesthetic attitude would persist in claiming that an artwork should not be approached from an ethical or political point of view if we are to appreciate it aesthetically. But, fortunately, many political art pieces have ethical value and the appropriate aesthetic response to them may include ethical assessments. To maintain the centrality of a disinterested attention means to sustain the aesthetic attitude which means independence of moral judgment and idiosyncratic personal emotions (among many other interdictions). Struggling to achieve this attitude (if possible to be achieved) would mean to totally overlook the point of this performance.

There is another path to follow, if we want to account for a disinterested aesthetic appreciation of political art. We cannot look at Orlan's artwork "for no reason" (or just to gaze at the vibrant red blood and symmetrical rearrangements of her face under surgical reconstruction). If we pay attention only to these so-called "internal properties" of the work does not mean that our appreciation is disinterested. There is no doubt that our attendance has some reasons and motivations behind it, but the crux of the matter rests in whether the reasons underlying our grasping are disinterested or not. Our reasons and motivations can be disinterested or interested and not our attention or perception. Another necessary step will be to discern the various ways in which the reasons and motivations guiding our apprehending of art are interested or disinterested. I claim that this is the appropriate understanding of disinterestedness for the reasons that I will discuss in details in what follows.

3.6. Rethinking Disinterestedness in Political-Critical Art's Appreciation

The kind of disinterested appreciation which seems suitable for political-critical art apprehension is to some extent closer to the 18th century (more precisely Shaftesbury's) understanding of it than the 20th century and contemporary interpretations. Disinterestedness is not the suppression or absence of all interests but it is opposed to pecuniary or selfish interests. Disinterestedness is a "noble" word denoting an ethical attitude toward art appreciation and not a privative concept as the absence of all interests excepting the aesthetic one. The so-called "aesthetic interest" is just an interest among others. To call only this interest "disinterested" (as the aesthetic tradition of modernity does) is misleading and mistaken. Disinterestedness has nothing to do with attention or perception but with peculiar motivations. In other words, there are individual motivations¹⁸² for disinterested acts and disinterested reasons to act, apprehend and think in certain ways. Shaftesbury would agree that disinterestedness does not mean to rule out interests but to guide and correct our interests by reflecting upon which one is morally condemnable and which one is directed towards "truth" and "good". Shaftesbury's disinterestedness has nothing to do with a purist, detached aesthetic attitude and, therefore it is not opposed to critical and moral evaluation.

The idea of disinterestedness I defend is rather that in which disinterestedness is inseparable from some kinds of interest than a radical separation of interest from disinterestedness. There is no such a thing as "complete disinterestedness", in the sense of "no interest allowed". Both Leibniz and Shaftesbury would agree that there is no apprehending or perception without something motivating them. What does it mean then, to be disinterested when apprehending political-critical art? Does it mean that we are not interested in the real existence of the object as Kant claims? Does it mean that we voluntarily eliminate all the interests except the aesthetic one? Obviously, we cannot be disinterested in Kantian sense in the real existence of the artistic object. We would not appreciate the relevance of a political piece, like Oleg Kulik's "I Bite America and America Bites Me" or Orlan's "Omnipresence" if they were life-size holograms or mannequins and not the artists themselves performing the painful task they perform. Moreover, the appreciation would be different if we know that the situation depicted in the art piece is totally invented and it never actually took place. We cannot concentrate on the formal aspects of a piece while disregarding the real existence of the artistic object precisely because this required "disinterestedness" is an un-ethical one. We cannot simply gaze at the chromatic composition of Orlan's performance while her real human face is surgical transformed without any worries regarding the real body involved in the art practice and for the politics it exhibits through this artistic gesture. Nevertheless, disinterestedness denotes something else than focusing exclusively on the internal or compositional features of the art piece.

¹⁸² Motivation is understood as that mental process which sustains goal directed behaviours. There are many types of motivations: social, cognitive, emotional, and psychological but I will not go into that here.

First of all, disinterestedness is independent of anything of economic value which would transform critical-political art into a commodity. The desire for possession of the art piece is again objectionable and it has no place in the state of mind appreciating political-critical art. In general, political art's public is committed to appreciating a sort of "good" in ethical sense (in terms of doing justice for those oppressed, marginal or excluded, disinterested consideration for others' welfare or one form or another of egalitarianism). The commitment to this ethical "good" gives rise to a peculiar type of disinterestedness. The sense in which I understand this term is not necessarily a Kantian one (even if, it could have some reverberations from Kant's aesthetics regarding the enjoyment of something for its own sake and not for benefits that it confers on the observer) but owes much more to Alain Badiou. For the French philosopher, interest is quintessentially animalistic – a struggle for survival (and this is what the human species has in common with all living creatures). It is exactly that which the ethical subject struggles to transcend. An ethical subject is interested not only to preserve his being in an animalist way but also (or more specifically) to participate in an “event of truth”.¹⁸³ Then, he /she surpasses the interests for survival (common to all living creatures) and pursues different interests: disinterested interests. Disinterestedness then, is not based upon a lack of interests but, as Rubinstein claims: “it is only when we have learned how to look with love upon the gifts life puts into our open hands without closing those hands in a futile undignified attempt to clutch them as they slip away, it is only when we can view with unregretful appreciation the loss of those homes to which we had no natural right, those friends who were not destined to be ours, it is only then that we may be said to have achieved the truly philosophical attitude-the attitude of disinterestedness”.¹⁸⁴

By the same token, “disinterested interest” in Badiou’s sense is not directly connected to the personal advantage or self-preservation but with pursuing some intrinsic values. Usually, we will guide our life under conditions in which we can try at any rate to pursue all our interests – those that derive from self-preservation (or maximization of profit) and those that derive from some conception of “good”, “just” or “true”. In certain extreme circumstances – martyrdom is perhaps the most striking instance – the course of action that is required by one’s conception of “good” conflicts with one’s self-preservation¹⁸⁵ interest. The interest in pursuing these intrinsic values is, in my view, the cornerstone of the accurate understanding of disinterestedness in political-critical art’s appreciation. As I have already ¹⁸³ For Badiou, both “event” and “truth” are used as technical terms. An “event” is a singular occurrence “which compels us to decide to adopt a new way of being” (Alain Badiou, Ethics: An Essay of the Understanding of Evil, Verso, London, 2001, p. 41). He gives examples of this kind of events which compel us to invent a new way of being: political, scientific and artistic revolutions, religious transformations, etc. (the French Revolution, the work of Galileo in physics and Schonberg in music). “Truth” does not designate some property of a proposition that could be tested scientifically (like “The Water is H₂O”, “An hour has sixty minutes” or “the cat is on the mat”) but the exemplary life as fidelity to an event which makes us new, better beings. A truth is sparked by an event and it is more like a subjective epiphany (Alain Badiou, Ethics: An Essay of the Understanding of Evil, Verso, London, 2001).

¹⁸⁴ Annette Rubinstein, “Disinterestedness as Ideal and as Technique”, The Journal of Philosophy, Vol. 28, No. 17, 1931, p. 462.

¹⁸⁵ “Martyrdom, one might think, is an infrequent occurrence, but the very fact that it is possible, even if rare, shows that self preservation and its interests cannot be the whole story about human beings, and that Disinterested interests exist” (Alain Badiou, Ethics: An Essay on the Understanding of Evil, translated by Peter Hallward, London: Verso, 2001, pp. 46-48).

mentioned in the previous chapters, political-critical art (oppositional art or art of resistance), strives to arouse viewer's awareness of the mechanism of domination turning her in a critical agent. The disinterested motivations which guide the spectator of this art to have the experience are located outside any pecuniary agenda.

Therefore, disinterestedness denotes the non-self interested (selfish) motivations or morally questionable motivations which foreground our apprehending and appreciation of art (and not only art). Until this point, my position does not essentially differ from Shaftesbury's. Still, Shaftesbury contrasts the disinterested stance toward an object with using that object for some purpose. He assumes that a disinterested apprehension is that apprehension which considers the object in its own terms, in a moral way (without selfish, pecuniary or symbolic advantages motivating the apprehension). At the same time, his disinterestedness is not permeable to the idea of using the object for some ulterior purposes. At this point, our conceptions of disinterestedness are no longer alike. I don't endorse the view that pursuing an ulterior purpose makes our attendance or appreciation less disinterested. Still, pursuing certain ulterior purposes can destroy the disinterestedness of appreciation but this does not mean that all ulterior purposes are detrimental to disinterestedness.

For Shaftesbury, an individual will not have a disinterested apprehending of an object (in our case a piece of critical art) if she has some peculiar, personal, self-serving utilitarian interest in it (or if she intends to use the object for an ulterior purpose). Let's illustrate that with an example: a spectator apprehends a theatrical performance dealing with the cruel treatments applied to the irregular migrants in a host country. The interests behind this apprehension are not selfish (the spectator is not motivated to sell the representation, to gain whatever prize or reward, to impress his partner and so on). Yet, if the spectator is a teacher and he/she wants to "use" this piece of art as a didactic tool in his/ her class with the motivation to increase the others awareness, Shaftesbury would claim that this utilitarian interest has to be contrasted with disinterestedness. In other words, disinterestedness is for him not only something which denotes the suppression of the selfish or self serving interests but also something opposed to utility in general. Although I agree with him that disinterestedness has to do with apprehending something without selfish or “bad” interests (or motivated by interests in gaining some public recognition or prize), I don’t endorse the view that all the ulterior purposes for which we may use the object are shadowing disinterestedness. As already stated, not all utilitarian purposes are self-interested in a negative sense. If I “use” a work of art with the purpose to help some people to escape modern slavery or with the purpose to increase awareness (or self-awareness) about, let’s say, seeing dignity in poverty, this approach of the art piece is not less disinterested. If a piece of art has instrumental or utilitarian value does not necessarily mean that this instrumental value cannot be an intrinsic value.

I suppose that Shaftesbury eliminates utility from disinterestedness just because in his days, the philosophical tradition used to hold that X’s intrinsic value must depend solely upon X’s intrinsic properties. By the same token, we appreciate X for its intrinsic value and this value¹⁸⁶ depends solely on the intrinsic properties of X. That is why Shaftesbury contrasts “the disinterested love of God” (a love pursued for its own sake), with the more common motive of serving God “for interest merely”. The disinterested love of God has then value that is entirely intrinsic¹⁸⁷ while “serving God for interests merely”¹⁸⁸ has just relational or instrumental value but not intrinsic value. This contrast between intrinsic value and instrumental value is also a corner stone in aesthetic theory of art. According to this view art has aesthetic value (intrinsic value depending solely upon art work’s intrinsic properties) and instrumental value (the good or bad effects of the piece on those who experience it or what the piece of art does).

¹⁸⁶ For some ethical theorists, value is contingent upon being awarded to an object by a valuer.

¹⁸⁷ See Arnold Berleant and Ronald Hepburn, “An Exchange on Disinterestedness”, in Contemporary Aesthetics, Vol. 1, 2003, source: <http://www.contempaesthetics.org/newvolume/pages/article.php?articleID=209> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

¹⁸⁸ The interests in serving God can be very different: a good place in the afterlife, achieving a saint’s aura during the life time or after, being afraid of God’s punishments if you don’t serve him, and so on.

But, as Shelly Kagan points out, in the majority of the cases, the traditional contrast between intrinsic value and instrumental value is mistaken.¹⁸⁹ X may be both instrumentally valuable and intrinsically valuable. Shaftesbury contrasts the disinterested stance toward an object with using that object for some purpose because he assumes that using the object for a purpose means to appreciate its instrumental value but not its intrinsic value. But, in some cases, there is no need to radically distinguish between appreciating something for its instrumental value from appreciating something for its intrinsic value. We can appreciate/value something intrinsically and part of the reason that we do so lies in the fact that we appreciate that object's usefulness. An example would be helpful again: a culinary skill is the ability to cook a meal. We can appreciate/value this skill for merely instrumental reasons (cooking food as means for pleasure) but, as Kagan argues, it is not an unusual view to hold that such skill is intrinsically valuable too (that they are valuable both as an end and not merely as a means).¹⁹⁰ We value the culinary skill for some reasons and an important part of the reasons we appreciate it lies exactly in the fact that this skill is useful: "that is to say, it is the usefulness-the instrumental value-of culinary skill that provides part of the intrinsic value of that skill".¹⁹¹

This is so because if the culinary skill loses its instrumental value (food is no longer needed or it does not give us pleasure anymore) then it will lose its intrinsic value too (what is a culinary skill if that skill serves nothing?). Same with critical art: some art pieces seem to be merely instrumentally valuable while in fact this instrumental evaluation is part of the art's work's experience (the intrinsic evaluation). We can value an artwork for its own sake, but part of this evaluation entails the derivation of other good things from it. In Shaftesbury's terms this would not be a disinterested apprehension/evaluation because only the intrinsic evaluation is disinterested. Everything which has to do with use or purpose (instrumental value) is not disinterested.

¹⁸⁹ Shelly Kagan, "Rethinking Intrinsic Value", The Journal of Ethics, Vol. 2, No. 4, 1998, p. 277.

¹⁹⁰ Idem, p. 284.

¹⁹¹ Idem, p. 285.

Yet, I argue that Shaftesbury's disinterestedness is to some extent more appropriate in critical-political art's apprehension and appreciation than modern and contemporary interpretations of it but this understanding is not completely satisfactory either. If a piece of art has an ulterior purpose and we use it to achieve that purpose it does not mean that our apprehending and our appreciation are no longer disinterested. We don't have to contrast appreciation of art as "means" (interested, instrumental) with appreciation "for its own sake" (disinterested, non-instrumental). Having an ulterior purpose in our appreciation of critical art is still a disinterested appreciation if that purpose (or purposes) is not morally bad, selfish or motivated by immoral desires.

Our interests in apprehending critical-political art pieces are directed toward some values like social justice, compassion, rightness, care, and so on. These values are both instrumental and intrinsic values. Thus usefulness is still unavoidable in disinterested aesthetic appreciation of critical art but this "utility" is not understood in economic or egoistic terms. The disinterested stance which suits the apprehending of politically concerned art involves an utilitarian agenda but this agenda has nothing to do with profit or selfish-interest of any kind (not only in economic terms but also in terms of prestige, public recognition, elitist belonging, awareness of the benefits of a good reputation, self-pride and so on). It is possible for human beings to act in a truly disinterested way without violating the rules of maximization of utility. Even though, from a strictly utilitarian economic rational point of view, disinterestedness looks irrational,¹⁹² disinterested motivations "are all the same rational”.¹⁹³ A disinterested motivation has to do with our personal commitments and concerns directed towards some intrinsic values (like care for other’s condition). When this concern for other’s condition is not motivated by the mechanisms of social recognition we can talk about a disinterested or intrinsically motivated stance. The commitment to appear in our own eyes and not in the eyes of others as disinterestedly motivated for pursuing the well being of others is not an egoistic motivation but a matter of self-respect and respect for the dignity and the welfare of others.

¹⁹² This is so because in a rational choice theory understanding, the rational subject will always strive to maximize profit. In this view, every action we take or we don't take is motivated by maximization of utility.

3.7. Conclusions

This chapter proposes a possible revision of disinterestedness in a way that is appropriate for political-critical art’s aesthetic appreciation. I have defended disinterestedness against several mistaken but influential interpretations of it. I have suggested that we should not overlook the importance of the sense in which we understand “disinterestedness”. In other words, we cannot disregard the question of what kind of understanding of disinterestedness we employ. A rigorous analysis of the concept may help us in employing it correctly. The kind of disinterestedness which seems suitable for political-critical art apprehension is to some extent closer to the 18th century (Shaftesbury’s) understanding of it than the 20th century and contemporary pronouncements. Disinterestedness is not the lack or absence of all interests or “no concern for any ulterior purpose” but it is opposed to pecuniary or selfish (or other ethically questionable) interests only.

“Disinterestedness” is a dignifying term, denoting an ethical attitude (like disinterested in taking advantage or profit) and not a privative concept as the absence of all interests. To appreciate art disinterestedly does not mean to bracket what we are but what we want. Yet, I have argued that not all of our wants (or interests directed toward these wants) are in opposition to disinterestedness. To appreciate disinterestedly does not mean placing the object of your appreciation outside of a utilitarian agenda (“no concern for any ulterior purpose”): just “utility” should be understood in non-economic terms. Something can be still useful for us outside of any advantage (economic or symbolic). The motives of appreciation (others than those self-interested) are crucial in the disinterested mode of appreciation of political-critical art. The commitment to appear in our own eyes and not in the eyes of others as disinterestedly motivated to pursuing the well being of others, social justice or carrying is not a selfishly motivated interest but a “disinterested interest”. Ethical motivations are not separated from the aesthetic ones when political art is apprehended.

¹⁹³ For a convincing argument regarding the rationality of the disinterested motivations, see Jon Elster, Le désintéressement. Traité critique de l’homme économique, (tome I), Seuil, Paris, 2009.

CHAPTER 4. BEAUTY AND POLITICAL ART: IS REALLY BEAUTY AT ODDS WITH CRITICAL ENGAGEMENT?

“Beautiful art is art that people are drawn towards” (Duncombe & Lambert, An Open Letter to Critics Writing on Political Art, 2012)¹⁹⁴

We often fail to make clear what we mean by “beauty”, even if we use it quite frequently, in all kinds of occasions, related to art or not. Something slippery is happening with “beauty” when we try to define it, something which comes close to the old Augustinian apothegm regarding time: “If you do not ask me what time is, I know it; if you ask me, I do not know”.¹⁹⁵ Beauty is to some degree like that, even if philosophers, artists and art theorists have struggled to capture it with a definition. There is no agreement on what beauty is, where beauty lies or if we can define it at all. We face the inability to find a quality in all art pieces we find beautiful that is the same in each of them. It has been a favourite issue for philosophers to find the common ground or essence which the word beauty denotes, but their effort has not solved the problem.

The fact that the meaning of words change over time is beyond doubt. The meaning of the word “beauty” may vary as well, creating difficulties when we try to explain it. Still, at least we can agree that “beauty” is an inherently evaluative concept. When we appreciate that something has beauty we implicitly accept that X is a source of positive aesthetic value or positive aesthetic appreciation. In the history of philosophical aesthetics, there are many theories and definitions of beauty. Despite differences, most of these theories connect the experience of the beautiful with a certain type of pleasure and enjoyment. Starting with “the aesthetic era” in the 18th century, beauty is taken to be a propensity in some objects to awake in viewers a distinctive type of unmediated pleasure – aesthetic pleasure. This ability to occasion pleasure is the only purpose (function) of beauty.

¹⁹⁴ Center for Artistic Activism, source: <http://artisticactivism.org/2012/10/an-open-letter-to-critics-writing-about-political-art/> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

¹⁹⁵ Aurelius Augustine of Hippo, Confessions, XI, 14, Oxford, 1992.

Many contemporary political artists deliberately produce an art as unappealing to the senses as possible (their attitude could be called kalliphobia). In doing this, they hope to distance their art both from the mainstream art world and from the art market.¹⁹⁶ So, the question is: to what extent is the category of “beauty” (as commonly understood) still valid and workable for political-critical art?

In this chapter I argue that even if beauty in critical art’s case seems to be a difficult one and not easy recognizable, this does not mean that it is absent or is at odds with critical engagement (as many politically engaged artists and critical theorists claim). Critical art does not endeavor to conform to a paradigmatic concept of beauty¹⁹⁷ because this art typically exhibits complex beauties, “odd beauties” and obscure beauties which, do not occasion an immediate pleasure and, even if, in some cases they occasion an immediate pleasure, this does not mean that pleasure nullifies critical engagement. The philosopher Bernard Bosanquet (in “Three Lessons on Aesthetics”) identifies two classes of things that are beautiful: easy beauty (which is pleasant to almost everyone: things that yield straightforward pleasure) and difficult beauty (which require from the spectator effort and concentration). Critical art is usually an edgy, disobedient art and its beauty is not immediately perceivable. It usually fits Bosanquet’s “difficult beauty” because it is not the kind of beauty which one just sees. On the contrary, the beautiful in critical art is rendered by cognitive and ethical concerns. What we know about an object and our beliefs and moral values always determine our opinion and our perception about what is beautiful and what is not beautiful. In this sense we could say that critical art’s beauty is a “difficult” beauty and not easily recognizable because we arrive at it after a process of deliberation.

¹⁹⁶ Max Ernst used to claim that my art is “not meant to attract, but to make people scream” (see Arthur Danto, Unnatural Wonders: Essays from the Gap Between Art and Life, Macmillan, 2005). The historical Avant-Garde has opened up a conceptual gap between art and beauty into which other aesthetic qualities might enter.

¹⁹⁷ According to this concept beauty is something which has to do with well-formed-ness, triggering an immediate pleasure in beholders.

I argue that beauty should not be restricted to an immediate type of pleasure if we want to account for its social and political relevance. Nevertheless, beauty can work politically and critically if we consider it not only as a specific kind of aesthetic pleasure. But, in order to act critically and politically, beauty needs in the first place to be re-visited and re-evaluated. In what follows, I claim that not everything that looks beautiful is actually beautiful.¹⁹⁸ Nor does every beautiful thing look good at first sight.¹⁹⁹ I hope to liberate beauty from the narrow cage of aesthetic appearance and immediacy which still rules the day in aesthetic theory and to show that beauty and critical art are not at odds.

Outline of the chapter

Many contemporary political artists, critical theorists and radical feminists posit that beauty is at odds with critical awareness and consequently, there is no place for beauty in critical art. These theorists have strong reasons to argue that beauty is at odds with critical awareness since the most well-known aesthetic theories of beauty deal exclusively with a narrow and purist understanding of it. However, in this chapter I argue that beauty is not in fact at odds with critical awareness but only the narrow aesthetic views of beauty are. These narrow views have become the paradigmatic understanding of beauty in aesthetic theory of art and nature. But, as Bosanquet posits, these narrow understandings of beauty refer to only the existence of “easy beauty” (things that generate straightforward pleasure, which are pleasant to almost everyone like roses, harmonious patterns or green fields). The fact that this narrow understanding of beauty is taken for granted by many, does not mean that beauty is exclusively what these theories claim it to be. My argument proceeds in four parts.

¹⁹⁸ Not always a thing that looks good and “beautiful” at first sight is in fact truly beautiful. A mushroom, for instance, may look good and beautiful but may be poisonous. A torture device (like the lead sprinkler) looks beautiful at first sight reminding a holly water sprinkler, but once we know its functions and purpose it does not strike us as beautiful anymore.

¹⁹⁹ In this journey I follow Alexander Nehamas, “The Return of the Beautiful: Morality, Pleasure, and the Value of Uncertainty”, in The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 58, No. 4, Fall 2000, pp. 393-403.

In the first section, I set forth and take issue with those narrow views which mistakenly identify the locus of beauty in disinterested experiences and unmediated pleasure. I also present and take issue with the popular view that beauty has no function “beyond the pleasure it generates”. The second part critically examines two contemporary theoretical attitudes regarding the unsuitableness of beauty’s presence in political art: according to the first, beauty is too weak and consequently useless; according to the second, on the contrary, beauty is too powerful and consequently damaging (for the beholder). On these grounds, pursuing beauty in critical art is avoided deliberately by many contemporary political artists.

In the third section I argue that political-critical art is characterized by a dependent type of beauty (beauty a thing has as a thing of a certain kind and with a certain function) as opposed to free beauty (as something we like it freely on its own account, independent of what it is and what it does). Political-critical art can claim a dependent beauty (an impure, “difficult” and not straightforward pleasurable type of beauty) without being compelled to submit itself, at the same time, to the free beauty. Why do I need to show that dependent beauty is not compelled to submit to the free beauty? Some aestheticians claim that only the judgment of free beauty remains within the aesthetic realm, while the judgment of dependent beauty (being an impure judgment) does not. By understanding political art’s beauty in terms of dependent beauty I attempt to show that beauty is not and should not be understood narrowly as self-subsistent because beauty is not independent of concerns with (a) conceptual classification (the beauty a thing has as a thing of a certain kind), and (b) functionality (beauty a thing has as a thing with a certain function). To this end, I revise in depth the Kantian distinction between free and dependent beauty attempting to show that beauty in art’s case is always dependent and never pure (free beauty). The aesthetic judgment of dependent beauty we make need not be grounded in the first place in any judgment of free beauty and this independence still remains within the aesthetic realm.

The fourth section attempts to argue that political-critical art can be “functionally beautiful” (that is, the dependent beauty a thing has as a thing with a certain function(s)). The conclusion will be that far from being opposed, beauty and critical - political art can operate soundly together, as long as we revise and remap our understanding of the concept of beauty. We don’t have to question beauty’s presence and appropriateness in critical art but only what some influential aestheticians have taught us about what beauty consists in; that is, their narrow and purist understanding of beauty (which has become the norm in traditional aesthetic theory to this day).

4.1. Narrow Aesthetic Theories of Beauty

What is the narrow view of beauty? The narrow view of beauty, typically takes beauty to be a propensity in some objects to occasion in viewers a certain kind of pleasure (immediate, disinterested etc). Further, not all properties of art objects can occasion this special kind of pleasure but only immediately perceivable properties such as (shapes, colors or sounds). One finds this view in empiricists such as John Locke and Edmund Burke and in some insights of Immanuel Kant on “free beauty”. Something is considered beautiful if it is pleasant at sight immediately and disinterestedly without taking into consideration the function/purpose or meaning of a beautiful thing. According to this view we don’t have to understand or reason of why something is beautiful but to just “sense” that it is. The big problem is that, in the narrow aesthetic theory, beauty is attributed only to those perceptual properties of objects and not to ideas, thoughts, customs, speeches, mathematical objects and proofs, behaviours or stories. In other words, a shape can be elegant or symmetrical, a colour or a sound can be delicate and we are allowed to say that forms, colours or sounds have aesthetic value and beauty but it is not appropriate to claim that ideas are elegant, or thoughts or discourses are beautiful in an aesthetic sense. The narrow view of beauty is dependent on sensual appearance. This narrow theory of beauty, which I do not accept, has several points which need opposing.

As already mentioned, in this section I take issue with those narrow approaches from traditional and contemporary aesthetics which mistakenly identify the locus of beauty in (a) unmediated pleasure, and (b) disinterested experiences; I also take issue with the view that (c) beauty and function are mutually exclusive (beauty has no other purpose/function beside the pleasure it gives when contemplated for its own sake).²⁰⁰

Contemporary aestheticians contend that the concept of beauty is a difficult and vague concept. That is the reason why it seldom receives attention. When it receives attention, either (a) beauty is completely rejected from art's appreciation on the grounds that art can be good art without being beautiful (Danto). or (b) the 'official', narrow understandings of beauty are taken for granted. In the history of Western aesthetics there are many theories of beauty; it would be difficult and pointless to list them all here. Yet, I will take into account at least two approaches very popular among philosophers of art and aestheticians: (a) the objectivist view of beauty, and (b) the subjectivist view.

(1) Many theorists and philosophers define beauty as a property of an object that causes in perceivers a pleasurable experience (of course, perceivers should be suitable persons in the sense that they must possess "delicacy of taste"). But the question is what exact property from the object produces this special kind of pleasure in viewers? There are various philosophical answers, but one of the most common interpretation has been that balance, proportion and symmetry are the kind of properties in art objects which produce a pleasant experience in viewers.²⁰¹ If Gombrich is right, this view of beauty “was so dominant in the 16th century that artists introduced pattern books, offering pictorial elements that artists could copy and combine with each other to create beauty”.²⁰²

²⁰⁰ Just to give an example of a narrow theory of beauty, Edmund Burke used to claim that beauty "strike(s) us without any reference to use, and even when no use at all can be discerned" (The Works of Edmund Burke: with a Memoir, New York: George Dearborn Publisher, p.75).

(2) The subjectivist view of beauty (“de gustibus non est disputandum” or “beauty is in the eyes of the beholder”) does not emphasize certain properties from objects (like balance, proportion, contrast or clarity) which produce a certain kind of pleasure in perceiving subjects. This approach stresses that anything can be beautiful if it pleases the senses.²⁰³ The two approaches (objectivist and subjectivist) still have something in common: beauty is related in both approaches to the feeling of immediate pleasure (even if this feeling is differently occasioned in each approach). It seems that beauty is typically understood as that which gives us pleasure. Now the question is: What kind of pleasure? The kind of pleasure involved in beauty is not the pleasure we take in finding solutions to puzzles, problems or in volunteering for the Red Cross. It is an immediate pleasure void of any reasoning or utility (we just like X for the way it looks to our senses; we don’t feel pleasure in apprehending what X does, means, suggests, enforces or symbolizes). If we follow this philosophical aesthetic tradition, we can say that the most popular definition of beauty as immediate pleasure without any reasoning owes much to Thomas of Aquinas (“quod visum placet”). Yet, as I will argue “what gives pleasure at sight” is not always beautiful (and, vice versa, what does not give pleasure at sight is not always ugly). When we talk about something which gives us immediate pleasure we rather talk about prettiness, pleasantness, loveliness than about beauty per se. Ruth Lorand was right to repeatedly claim that “beauty is not always nice and ‘soothing’; it can generate pain and restlessness, as well as great joy.”²⁰⁴ Keep in mind that ²⁰¹ Other beauty-making properties are: contrast, clarity, complexity and so on.

²⁰² Rolf Reber, Norbert Schwarz and Piotr Winkelman, “Processing Fluency and Aesthetic Pleasure: Is Beauty in the Perceiver’s Processing Experience?”, Personality and Social Psychology Review, Vol. 8, No. 4, 2004, p. 364.

²⁰³ Ibidem.

²⁰⁴ Ruth Lorand, “In Defence of Beauty”, Aesthetics Online, source: http://www.aesthetics-online.org/articles/index.php?articles_id=34 (last accessed 6 August 2013).

beauty is an evaluative concept connoting a positive aesthetic quality.²⁰⁵ Sometimes (in traditional aesthetics), beauty used to refer to all positive aesthetic qualities (unified, delicate, balanced, symmetrical, elegant, dainty, graceful and so on). Appreciating a thing as beautiful typically expresses a good-making quality. The appreciation that X is beautiful means that X is valuable for its beauty (then beauty is also an aesthetic value, not only an aesthetic quality). Still, even if in this conception, beauty is understood as a “too wide” concept (referring to all positive aesthetic qualities mentioned above), it still remains a narrow view of beauty. What makes it narrow? The beauty of an object depends exclusively on its perceptual appearance. Unified, delicate, balanced, symmetrical, elegant, graceful –all these have to do with perceptual appearance because all these properties are sensed properties.

The narrow understanding of beauty which emphasizes only the perceivable properties and the pleasure they occasion in us, disregards the aesthetic value of an artwork as a whole. An artwork typically has aesthetic value as a whole. We cannot consider only certain perceivable properties (form), or only the subject matter when appreciating aesthetically a piece of art. Of course that we can consider the value of the perceivable properties and the value of the subject matter separately but we should not confuse the aesthetic values of the work as a whole with the value of its constituent parts. As Lorand suggests, “the beauty of the components and the beauty of the work as a whole do not directly determine each other. This crucial distinction has been disregarded by contemporary aestheticians (...) the fact that a work distorts conventional beauty images and presents “ugly” images does not make the work itself ugly, just as a work that portrays beautiful objects is not necessarily beautiful.”²⁰⁶

²⁰⁵ Goodman claims that there are two important ways to understand the word “beauty”: (a) beauty as an inclusive notion that is equivalent to the aesthetic value, and (b) beauty as aesthetic praise (Nelson Goodman, Language of Art, Indianapolis, 1976).

²⁰⁶ Ruth Lorand, “In Defence of Beauty”, Aesthetics Online, source: http://www.aesthetics-online.org/articles/index.php?articles_id=34 (last accessed 6 August 2013).

Figure 5: Damien Hirst, Butterfly Series, source of the image:
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/10/16/damien-hirst-kills-9000-b_n_1970627.html.
 Hirst arranged thousands of butterfly wings in a mandala like pattern. Some art critics find this piece “strikingly beautiful”. The fact that the piece portrays beautiful objects and it is immediately pleasant at sight is not enough to count as a beautiful piece because “not everything that looks beautiful is actually beautiful”.²⁰⁷

Let’s move now to another narrow approach of beauty: Kant’s “disinterestedness”. More than others, Kant’s concept of “purposiveness without purpose” gave a new turn to the theory of beauty. The modern aesthetician, following rightly or wrongly Kant’s aesthetics wants to connect the idea of beauty to a quality of the visual or auditory appearance of an object, namely, its capacity to provide certain kinds of pleasant perceptual experiences. In very general lines the modernist aesthetics holds that:

- (a) either the concept of beauty is appropriately used when it is advanced in connection with the so-called “aesthetic experience” of the form/surface of an object, or ²⁰⁷ Alexander Nehamas, “The Return of the Beautiful: Morality, Pleasure, and the Value of Uncertainty”, in The journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 58, No. 4, Fall 2000, pp. 393-403.

(b) the concept of “beauty” is ambiguously or incorrectly used on other , non-aesthetic occasions (a beautiful fight for human rights, a beautiful roast pork, a beautiful demonstration in mathematics, a beautiful solution for diminishing the starvation). In other words, the design of a forest (in let’s say a painting) is beautiful in aesthetic sense, while a demonstration in mathematics or a behaviour cannot be beautiful in aesthetic sense, because beauty has to do only with immediately perceiving a surface of an object and feeling an immediate pleasure.

In traditional aesthetic terms, beauty is taken to be a disinterested apprehension of the directly perceivable properties of objects, like proportion, balance, symmetry, rhythm which gives us a special sort of pleasure, namely the aesthetic pleasure. This pleasure is not just a pleasure among other pleasures, but a disinterested one, that ‘just happens to us’. In its pure (free), Kantian understanding, beauty is conceptless and useless; it is that which without a concept pleases universally (conclusion from the second moment in the definition of the beautiful).²⁰⁸

Kant says that “The beautiful is that which, apart from concepts, is represented as the object of universal delight” (in the Third Critique, paragraph 6). This definition is deduced by him simply from the previous definition of beauty as an object of delight apart from any interest. He wants to totally eliminate interest from judgments of taste because in his view interest implies desire, want, prejudice, pre-understanding and all these are “impure” and corrupt the contemplation of ‘pure’ beauty, which should be disinterested.

This requirement of complete disinterestedness raises the demand of universality for all men and women. But absolute disinterestedness is not possible at all, as I have argued in the previous chapter. So, on which grounds is he deducing universality? Firstly, even if I struggle to suspend all my interests nothing guarantees me that I can really eliminate all of them, even those I don't know about. Secondly, my struggle to achieve disinterestedness, in order to fulfil the purist aesthetic imperatives, is to some extent a sort of interest, namely "the 'interest' to achieve the state of disinterestedness.

²⁰⁸ According to Kant, there are four “moments” in the judgement of beauty: disinterestedness, universal pleasure, detachment from the concept, and beauty speaking to common sense (Immanuel Kant, The Critique of Judgment, trans. Werner S. Pluhar, Indianapolis: Hackett, 1987).

However, as I will argue later on, Kant seems to endorse the fundamental disinterestedness in aesthetic pleasure of free beauty but not in dependent beauty (which in Kant's aesthetic theory characterizes only art). Moreover, he seems to admit that beauty in art engages our interests. It does so differently in nature and art, and the comparison between natural beauty and artistic beauty opens up this theoretical problem. He speaks about a 'disinterested pleasure' and not of our disinterest in judging the beautiful (as he is often wrongly understood). From the doctrine of the "ideal Beauty" (in which morality is involved) he derives an advantage of natural beauty over artistic beauty: in a first instance he favours natural beauty over art's beauty. But, as I will try to show below (in section 4.3.), even the interest in natural beauty is moral. However, Kant's followers do not make any distinction at all. For them beauty in art disengages any interest (see the aesthetic attitude theorists, for example).

Finally, there is another narrow account of beauty I would like to oppose: according to it, beauty has no function (apart from that of triggering aesthetic pleasure). Starting with the 18th century, many rejected the link between beauty and utility/functionality in art appreciation.²⁰⁹ Beauty and function are seen as mutually exclusive. A beautiful object is that object which has no use or function. In Augustine's view the male nipple has pure beauty because it serves no function. It is beautiful because it is functionless.

By the same token, beauty in art is thought to have no function; it has to be contemplated and valued for its own sake only. Theophile Gautier (the first theorist of art for art's sake doctrine) used to claim that "nothing is really beautiful unless it is useless; everything useful is ugly, for it expresses a need, and the needs of man are ignoble and disgusting (...) The most useful place in a house is the lavatory.”²¹⁰ This dismissal of the connection between function and beauty had been almost unconceivable in the pre-aesthetic era.²¹¹ Jonathan L. Friedman posits that “listening to music for pleasure was an unknown concept in the ancient world.”²¹² Music has been used in certain contexts (e.g. religious, public rituals or festivities) to perform certain functions. Outside these occasions, little attention has been given to listening to music merely for pleasure.

²⁰⁹ For example, David Hume advocates an early art for art's sake position by stressing that the only function of beautiful art is the pleasure it affords. Edmund Burke, Roger Fry and Jerome Stolnitz claim that attributions of beauty have nothing to do with considerations of functionality.

Starting with the aesthetic era, a powerful view developed in post-Enlightenment Western Culture: only fine art qualifies as aesthetic arts (have aesthetic value). Fine arts are those non-functional arts appreciated for their own sake (arts meant just to be beautiful and to occasion aesthetic pleasure). These arts are not made to serve art extrinsic functions, as functional arts are (religious art serves the function of glorifying God; architecture serves the primary function of offering shelter; political art serves a critical function; textile arts serve to construct practical and decorative objects and so on). Functional arts are not regarded in traditional aesthetics as properly aesthetic precisely because they serve a practical, art-extrinsic function. In short, “uselessness” started to become central to the modern concept of art and beauty.

So, beauty in aesthetic era is paradigmatically understood as formal beauty of an item, which is the beauty of a thing merely in virtue of how this thing appears to our senses directly without regard of to what kind of thing it is or what it does (purpose or function). Functional arts (religious art, political art, architecture, crafts etc) are regarded in this purist (narrow) aesthetics as impure arts or at best second-class arts, lacking aesthetic value. Then, several contemporary aestheticians are right to reject this narrow, non-functional theory of beauty by arguing that this tension between beauty and function is “not real”.²¹³ Beauty is an aesthetic value (positive aesthetic evaluation) which can be related to function (in the sense that we can judge a functional object as beautiful when its aesthetic properties contribute to the fulfilment of the function of that object). For example, a tragedy is beautiful in a functional way if its aesthetic properties appear to fulfil the function of a tragedy. Even if some aesthetic properties are directly perceivable (like elegance, simplicity) and they seem beautiful to us this does not mean that their beauty is always apprehended apart from utility (as traditional/modernist aesthetic requires). Actually it may be the case that in some instances there is a conjunction between simplicity/elegance and utility in considering something beautiful. Like in the case of a beautiful discourse: a discourse can be functionally beautiful. It may have some aesthetic qualities (let’s say simplicity, strength) which make it approachable, convincing and empowering. But we cannot appreciate that the discourse is beautiful just because it is simple and we like it. By the same token, the function of a discourse is to convince but this alone does not make it beautiful (even if it is really convincing) but the discourse is beautiful both through the manner in which it fulfils its function (to convince) and as a result of fulfilling its function in that way (with simplicity and strength).

²¹⁰ Theophile Gautier, “Mademoiselle de Maupin”, 1981.

²¹¹ In classical Greek thought an object might be called beautiful (kalos) with reference to a purpose, and non-beautiful with reference to another purpose. What makes something beautiful is the fitness for purpose. A house is beautiful if it keeps warm during the winter and cold during the summer; a shoe is beautiful if the foot feels good in it, and so on (for a detailed argument, see Allan Carlson and Glen Parsons, Functional Beauty, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 2008, p.23).

²¹² Jonathan Friedman, ‘Beauty and Function’, online article on ‘Thinking on Music – Exploring Music in the Human Experience’, source: <http://thinkingonmusic.wordpress.com/2012/11/12/beauty-and-function/> (last accessed on 6 August 2013).

Still, conceding that beauty and function are not mutually exclusive does not mean that: (a) every object’s functional effectiveness has aesthetic value and is functionally beautiful, (b) there is just one kind of beauty (beauty in virtue of a function), or (c) beauty is to be explained solely in terms of function or utility. But, even if not all beauty is functional (although, in art’s case, the majority is) we have no reasons to ignore the cases in which beauty is functional. In the aesthetic appreciation of beauty (a cognitively rich appreciation, of course), it is relevant not only the object's form or shape but also considerations about its function or purpose.

²¹³ See Glen Parsons and Allan Carlson, Functional Beauty, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2008 and Stephen Davies, “Aesthetic Judgments, Artworks, and Functional Beauty”, The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 56, No. 223, 2006, pp. 224-241. According to these contemporary aestheticians there is no juxtaposition between beauty and function. Functional beauty is a new theory in contemporary aesthetics meant to rehabilitate the relationship between beauty and function which has been under attack in aesthetic theories of art.

4.2. The Deliberate Avoidance of Beauty in Contemporary Political Art

In this section I attempt to show, against the common view held by contemporary political artists and theorists that beauty is not at odds with critical engagement. I respond to those contemporary political artists' and theorists' claim that beauty is at odds with the struggle for social justice. Their distrust is a direct consequence of the way in which beauty has been conceived in the mainstream aesthetic theory of art. At the same time, I want to stress that putting beauty back on the agenda (as several contemporary theorists have done) is not enough for beauty's rehabilitation, unless we re-appreciate the significance of what is considered beautiful; the relationship between beauty and function and the understanding of beauty.

There is a theoretical tendency which places the concern with beauty in art in a totally different dimension than the concern for social justice. Political art is art with critical function (or purpose); art which typically does not look pleasant at sight. Beauty is then for many contemporary artists a discredited aesthetic category. They hold that political art does not need to be beautiful to be good, relevant, effective and significant. Moreover, beauty has to be deliberately avoided in contemporary political art because beauty does not help the art piece to fulfil its critical point but, on the contrary, it may occasion the wrong kind of experience in spectators (distanced, disinterested, passive).

Yet, even if art is not and should not be necessarily beautiful, this does not mean that beauty (when it is present in art) damages somehow the art piece's impact and significance, as some theorists are inclined to suggest. In trying to deal with the issue of beauty in critical-political art and its impact for philosophical aesthetics I have realized the predominance of two main conflicting theoretical attitudes:

- (a) one considers beauty to be useless (without purpose or function), powerless, just that “which is pleasant at sight”;
- (b) the other treats beauty as quite the opposite (beauty is too powerful, a force which harms the object looked at and overwhelms our attention so much that we cannot take our eyes from it long enough to look at social injustices). Regarding political art’s relation to beauty, it seems obvious that none of the above positions offer a justification for why beauty matters in critical art.

In the first case, beauty comes to mean “merely” beautiful. In other words, it occasions a certain kind of pleasure in beholders which does not help fulfilling effectively political art’s functions. It is too weak to count for political art’s purposes, it does not matter, it is not righteous, and it is a demoted aesthetic notion which can be anytime replaced by sublime (which is great, it moves the soul, it is righteous and so on).

In the second case (beauty is too powerful), beauty is totally rejected. Some hold that beautiful things distract our attention from injustice, pain, moral crimes and sufferance. Adorno famously declaimed the barbarism of “lyric” poetry after Auschwitz.²¹⁴ These considerations did not remain without consequences and beauty tends to be avoided from political art. The argument runs like this: beauty is immoral because it preoccupies our attention, distracting it from wrong social arrangements. Danto explained his worries regarding the inappropriateness of beauty in contemporary art and the way in which beauty threatens to conceal injustice, sufferance and other social diseases.

²¹⁴ Theodor Adorno, “Commitment”, in Andrew Arto (ed.), The Essential Frankfurt School Reader, Gebhardt, New York, 1982, p. 82.

Besides these two categories of criticism there are also other secondary critiques of beauty:

(c) another suspicion of beauty (closely related to the “beauty is too powerful” claim) comes from feminist aesthetic theory: when we look at a beautiful object/person we actually damage the object or person by turning it into a mere object that we feel superior to (like in the case of the ‘male gaze’ at female’s beauty);

(d) Passmore further points the contention that beauty expresses the wrong social values (the bourgeois’ values)²¹⁵; and Peter Benson accused beauty of being non-democratic (it is distributed unequally among people and those who can produce it or buy it are a valued minority, a favoured elite).²¹⁶ All the above diatribes have contributed to the view that beauty has no place in political-critical art production and strategies. In a nutshell, beauty is at odds with critical awareness and engagement.

After noticing these contemporary critiques of beauty one could argue that there is no way to reconcile beauty and political-critical art since each of them nullifies the other. It is the aim of this study to suggest the contrary. Beauty does not prevent one for standing up for justice. It is also true that all these worries regarding beauty’s negative impact are not necessarily chimerical. They are grounded on a certain, “official”, narrow conception of beauty which still lingers on in aesthetic theory of art – in which beauty is defined as being indissoluble united with surface and appearance, with immediate perception and disinterested pleasure, totally independent (“pure” beauty) from other values, attitudes, moral judgments and so on. If we accept this paradigm then of course that beauty will never matter for political art and moreover, it will be deliberately avoided and rejected by political artists (and they will be right to do so). Yet, I think we have significant reasons to consider that beauty matters for political art. The reservations and worries regarding beauty's presence in critical art depend on what we take beauty to be.

²¹⁵ J. A. Passmore, “The Dreariness of Aesthetics”, in W. Elton (ed.), Aesthetics and Language, Basil Blackwell, Oxford, 1954, pp. 36-55.

²¹⁶ Peter Benson, “On Beauty and Being Just by Elaine Scarry”, Philosophy Now, source: http://www.philosophynow.org/issue44/On_Beauty_and_Being_Just_by_Elaine_Scarry (last accessed 12 February 2011).

Now, I have to say that the first "critique" of beauty (point (a) according to which beauty is "too weak" or "merely beautiful" to be helpful for political art's purposes) is so obviously wrong that it does not even need too much opposing. It would be enough just to mention the concrete situation of music therapy, colour therapy and so on (so beauty is not too weak). Then, I would suggest that beauty is not "too powerful" either; it does not prevent us from seeing and condemning social injustice (point (b)). When I see a beautifully depicted sufferance of a child wounded in war I am aware that beauty is inappropriate in presenting that drama but that image also reminds me of my own inappropriateness (to experience that piece in that way) and this acknowledgement of my own inappropriateness when experiencing that piece increases my awareness regarding human suffering. The compelling impact of beauty, even in miserable conditions, rekindles our sensitivity and allows for further development of the moral insight. In this sense, it becomes political – "because we can bring about changes in our conception of beauty" by contextualizing it.²¹⁷

The other 'danger' of beauty ((c) "beholders are all powerful and persons beheld are powerless") announced by feminist critiques is also untenable. The simple act of looking is not by any definition a bad thing. I don't see how our 'looking' would damage /offend the person or the object. Elaine Scarry argued that this argument is totally faulty because it just assumes that we are incapable of generous acts of looking. She offers the example of Dante (so, a masculine gazer) staring at Beatrice in Vita Nuova. His contemplation of beautiful Beatrice makes him vulnerable and even weak (he is awed and humbled in front of her beauty). Dante's example is not unique. All the poets from Dolce Stil Nuovo have seen the woman as possessing an excessively divine beauty (like "a bridge to God"). This means that the viewer is “affected” by what he sees and not vice versa. On the other hand, we should rather assume a certain degree of generosity in human looking than to suspect the presence of the power relations (in terms of beholders-beheld).

²¹⁷ Dave Beech (ed.), Beauty, MIT Press, 2009.

For contemporary political artists “beauty” is a vague, deceptive and ultimately a futile concept (if not even an offensive one). As stated at the beginning, my intention was to offer an account of beauty that will not be at odds with critically and politically concerned art. It seems that the commonsensical way of understanding beauty in art (as immediate pleasure; disinterested pleasure, non-functionality and so on) makes critical art a non-beautiful art. But this approach is actually unacceptable. It cannot be the case that the most remarkable and characteristic problem of aesthetics is that of beauty understood as perceiving the form alone, independent of any meaning or art-external concerns and purposes/functions. My point here is that approaching beauty in art without interests, preconceptions, or at least curiosity is not to approach an art object/situation at all. The pure form of an art object that is presented directly before us (to our senses) is never enough to account for beauty. How does the object look is not enough to appreciate it as beautiful because beauty is not that easy (as prettiness or lovingness are).

Traditionally (following mainly but not exclusively Kantian aesthetics), beauty has been defined as the agency of disinterested pleasure. According to this main approach, art is necessarily associated with something meant to be beautiful, or at least with something that we attend just in order to enjoy ourselves, but not in order to get involved with or nervous with. I have argued that political art could be, and many times is beautiful, without striving to be beautiful in the first place. In other words, political art does not struggle to be beautiful (this is not its main purpose or function) but in spite of this, many times, it is beautiful. Perhaps many contemporary aestheticians and even political artists would discredit the idea on the simple ground that conceptually “beauty” has nothing to do with critical, social or political art and, moreover, the very idea of avant-garde art rejects “beauty”. Many contemporary voices maintain that being ‘too aesthetic’ or “too beautiful” is a detrimental appreciation of political art. For instance, the artist Shirin Neshat expresses her critical stance both in form and content, and is politically engaged vis-à-vis both Islam and gender issues. Her art has been criticized for being ‘too aesthetic’ and ‘too beautiful’ to matter as political art.

As I have mentioned, in contemporary art practice there is a tendency which places the concern for social justice in a totally different sphere than the theoretical concern with beauty. Simply put it, if a political message is at stake beauty should disappear since beauty blocks the forcefulness of the message. Arthur Danto pronounced his indictment of engaged art stating that there is always a danger in activist art: “I can understand how the activist should wish to avoid beauty; simply because beauty induces the wrong perspective on whatever it is the activist wants something to be done about”.²¹⁸

Some theorists explicitly state that both the sublime and the political or “real” are the enemies of beauty and today’s writing on beauty is deeply a-political: “it is mostly unwilling to contemplate the legitimacy of artistic practices that take a stand and bring together the aesthetic, the cognitive, and the critical, preferring instead to value artworks that operate independently of any practical interest.”²¹⁹ I entirely disagree with these claims. On the contrary, I would suggest that it is the very beauty of a political/critical art piece that makes its message powerful and empowering. The fact that so many times beauty is rejected from political art’s strategies and tactics is due to a huge misunderstanding and misconception going on around the concept of beauty.

²¹⁸ Arthur Danto, “Beauty and Morality”, in Bill Beckley and David Shapiro (eds.), Uncontrollable Beauty, Allworth Press, New York, 1998, p. 36.

²¹⁹ Arthur Danto, “Beauty and Morality”, in Bill Beckley and David Shapiro (eds.), Uncontrollable Beauty, Allworth Press, New York, 1998, p. 36.

Another powerful claim is that political artists deliberately destroy or avoid beauty in their production as a sort of artistic-political ‘statement’ against the official aesthetic discourse of academia, art market and so on. The main anti-beauty movement in contemporary art is based on the conviction that beauty has been one of the most important art’s institutional discourses which is a sign of power and exclusion. We have reasons to accept this argument only if we endorse an understanding of “beauty” which emphasizes immediate pleasantness, purity and “disinterestedness” (in the sense of no interest allowed, no ulterior purpose) but, in the real world of art, beauty is none of these. Many theorists follow Gertrude Stein in holding strongly that ‘beauty’ has to be avoided in contemporary political art because its traces would redirect viewer’s attention from social injustice. She once said that to call a work of art beautiful means that it is dead (because beautiful has come to mean “‘merely’ beautiful”) and this dictum seems still powerful and convincing for many.²²⁰ That is why “beauty” has never been a central aim of contemporary political art which has tended to focus on meaning and politics rather than on formal values.

Arthur Danto has described this reaction against beauty as “kalliphobia” (beauty phobia) and repeatedly argued that “beauty is in exile” and, moreover, “the discovery that something can be good art without being beautiful was one of the greatest conceptual clarifications of the 20th century philosophy of art.”²²¹ I have no doubts that this argument has its strength and importance especially because on its basis the very concept of ‘art’ is enlarged considerably (making room for conceptual, ready-made, performance art in it) and non-perceptual works come into picture (since, according to Danto “X is art if it embodies a meaning”).²²² At the same time I’m totally sympathetic with Danto’s great contribution to contemporary philosophy of art in what regards his arguments against the necessary link between art and beauty. Indeed, nowadays it is a merely ‘historical view’ (belonging to the History of Aesthetics) that art is paradigmatically and essentially concerned with the creation of beautiful objects only.

²²⁰ See Susan Sontag, ‘An Argument about Beauty’, Daedalus, Fall 2002, p. 22.

²²¹ Arthur Danto, “The Abuse of Beauty”, Daedalus, Vol. 131, No. 4, Fall 2002, p. 49.

²²² Arthur Danto, ‘The Artworld’, The Journal of Philosophy, Vol. 61, No. 19, 1964, pp. 571-584.

Yet, on the other hand, there is one thing to realize that beauty is no longer a necessary quality of a work of art, and good art need not be mandatory beautiful (which Danto did), and there is a totally different thing to posit that “beauty had disappeared not only from art, but from advanced philosophy of art.”²²³ This is an overstatement. I don’t know if beauty is a discredited philosophical notion, as Nehamas posited,²²⁴ but what seems without doubt is the fact that beauty has never been in exile. It is enough to observe people’s reactions in front of various kinds of beautiful objects of everyday life, in front of natural beauties, mathematical proofs and theorems; in front of the beauty of a courageous act or sacrifice and, yes, in front of the most diverse art forms and productions. On many other levels beauty has been/is present in our lives and we have never ceased to pursue it. I disagree instead with the narrow views according to which (a) beauty is that which gives to our senses immediate and disinterested pleasure, and (b) beauty has no other function or purpose, excepting the pleasure it affords.

I think we have no reason to question beauty or to give up pursuing it, basing our denial on a narrow aesthetic theory whose recommendations convert beauty into something which expresses the wrong social/political values. It is also beyond any doubt that beauty, as it is traditionally theorized, many times serves and expresses wrong social “values” (like racism, anti-feminism) but it does not follow that beauty always does this and, as a consequence, political art should avoid it on purpose. Eagleton presented convincingly in his “Ideological Aesthetics” avant-garde’s choice to stay away from beauty: “The avant-garde’s response to the cognitive, ethical and aesthetic is quite unequivocal. Truth is a lie; morality stinks; beauty is shit. And of course they are absolutely right. Truth is a White House communiqué; morality is the Moral Majority; beauty is a naked woman advertising perfume. Equally, of course, they are wrong. Truth, morality and beauty are too important to be handed contemptuously over the political enemy.”²²⁵ As we can see, the problem is not with beauty but with what “beauty” is taken to be. As Kant and Elaine Scarry rightly pointed out, the desire of beauty is inexhaustible: any other pleasure we get exhausted by (too much food, sex, good wines) but beauty is never too much. I don’t deny that beauty (as it is traditionally conceived and defined) has limits as a moral arm, and Danto is right to hold that artistic beauty is thoroughly inappropriate in some art instances (like the depiction of a concentration camp as beautiful or sexy). But even if these instances are not to be neglected we cannot claim that beauty is suspect and detrimental to human values (including the political ones).

²²³ Arthur Danto, “The Abuse of Beauty”, Daedalus, Vol. 131, No. 4, Fall 2002, p. 37.

²²⁴ Alexander Nehamas, “The Return of the Beautiful: Morality, Pleasure, and the Value of Uncertainty”, in The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 58, No. 4, Fall 2000, p. 402.

I contend that all these critiques directed against the appropriateness of beauty in contemporary critical-political art are triggered by a misunderstanding of beauty in the sense that beauty is taken to be that which occasions merely sensuous pleasure (its source being identified in pleasant looking forms). It seems that contemporary political artists attempt to avoid just one kind of beauty, Kant’s type of “free beauty” (unmediated pleasure, useless beauty, conceptless beauty). Curiously enough, Kant also talks about another beauty (dependent beauty), but this kind of beauty is less popular in both aesthetic theories of art and in common thinking about beauty.

4.3. Revisiting Kantian Theory of Dependent Beauty: Political Art and Dependent Beauty

Let me first sketch Kant’s distinction between free beauty (pulchritudo vaga) and dependent beauty (pulchritudo adhaerens): free beauty is a beauty whose judgment is grounded in the subject's aesthetic pleasure. This judgment is pure – a pure judgment of taste based on the subject's aesthetic pleasure. Objects which are freely beautiful have no intrinsic meaning; “they represent nothing” (like in Kant's example with the designs a la greque, music without a theme or without words, flowers, birds).²²⁶ In this understanding our taste for beautiful (the pleasure we take in beautiful songs without words) is a disinterested pleasure. A pure (free) judgment of beauty is based solely on the purposiveness of the form of an object. Free beauty is self-subsistent (we like it freely on its own account). In conclusion, free beauty is independent of concerns with (a) conceptual classification (the beauty a thing has as a thing of a certain kind) and (b) functionality (beauty a thing has as a thing with a certain function).

²²⁵ James Smith, Terry Eagleton, Polity Press, 2008, p. 372.

Dependent beauty (also called by Kant adherent, accessory beauty) is a beauty which gives us intellectual pleasure. Objects which are dependently beautiful are always about something, represent something and have an intrinsic meaning of “what the thing has to be”. The dependent beauty of a thing is “the beauty that it has as a thing with certain function.”²²⁷ Nick Zangwill convincingly shows the importance of understanding Kantian dependent beauty in terms of function. He holds that something has a function only if it has a history, unlike the free beauty of a thing which is independent of its function and of its history (a thing has free beauty at a time just in virtue of how it is at that time): “Many of those who discuss Kant's distinction between free and dependent beauty miss the crucial teleological dimension of the distinction. They think that dependent beauty is just a matter of subsuming a thing under a concept. But the crucial thing is subsuming something under a concept of its function.”²²⁸ Later on, I will make clearer what “a concept of a function” entails.

²²⁶ Philip Mallaband, “Understanding Kant's Distinction between Free and Dependent Beauty”, The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 52, No. 206, Jan 2002, pp. 66-81.

²²⁷ Nick Zangwill, “Beauty”, in Jerrold Levinson (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of Aesthetics, Oxford University Press, 2005, p. 333.

²²⁸ Nick Zangwill, “Beauty”, in Jerrold Levinson (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of Aesthetics, Oxford University Press, 2005, p. 333.

In sum, dependent beauty touches upon aesthetic ideas rather than aesthetic perceivable forms. All representational art is in this Kantian picture dependently beautiful. It is not possible to judge artistic beauty non-dependently. All judgments of art are dependent at least in the minimal sense (judgments of art are judgments in the light of the concept of art). Kant explicitly states in the paragraph 48 of the third Critique that all artistic beauty is dependent beauty. It seems that he felt the need to distinguish between the two beauties – but why? Perhaps he realized that in some instances (in art’s case) cognition cannot be eliminated from aesthetic experience. Eliminating it from the aesthetic experience of art simply means to miss art’s point. All art has a meaning and a purpose in a more direct or indirect way (and political art in the most obvious way). In this case, we cannot view art as freely beautiful unless we deliberately disregard its concept and purposes.

In what follows, I argue that Kant’s “dependent beauty” can adequately account for beauty in political-critical art’s case (and in art in general). I claim that in political art’s case (and in art’s case more generally) we judge an object dependently beautiful without judging it freely (purely) beautiful. Before developing this argument, let me recall that the few contemporary discussions of beauty in conjunction with politics touch mainly upon Hegel’s aesthetics (since Kantian aesthetics is seen by many as too purist/formalist to do justice to beauty in critical art’s case). Referring to Hegel seems a legitimate choice since he was one of the first philosophers holding that works of artistic beauty display a fusion of sensuous data with the meaning intended by the artist (including a political meaning). Arthur Danto also takes Hegel’s aesthetics as the starting point of his contentions regarding what he calls “internal beauty”. There is an enigmatic phrase in Hegel’s writings on beauty, namely: “beauty of art is beauty born of spirit and born again” which comes to be explained by Danto in his article “Beauty and Morality”.²²⁹ This “twice born” of artistic beauty may be understood as two intermingled instances: (a) beauty is internal to the concept of the work in artist’s mind, and (b) beauty is then enacted in the work itself (so, first the idea and second the embodiment of the idea). In this way we could talk about “beauty in” (internal to the meaning, content, idea, or concept) rather than about “beauty of” (beauty that is not internal to the meaning).²³⁰ Nevertheless, Hegel’s insights on artistic beauty allow the political art theorist to deal with the issue of beauty within politically concerned and involved art, since it is obvious that beauty, as Hegel sees it, has to do more with something cognitive rather than merely sensualistic.

When we come to Kant’s aesthetics, we can straightforwardly observe how political art theorists usually reject the entire Kantian aesthetic project on the grounds that the aesthetic pleasure we take in capturing beauty and critical engagement are fundamentally irreconcilable.²³¹ But is this so? Is this rejection of Kant’s aesthetics reasonable? I will show that Kant’s aesthetic understanding of “dependent beauty” is not at odds with critical-political art. Those theorists, who reject Kant’s aesthetics of beauty tout court, fail to keep in mind Kant’s dependent beauty or hold that dependent beauty is a subspecies of free beauty and that we can’t judge an object dependently beautiful without judging it freely beautiful in the first place.

It is generally acknowledged that the modern stream of aesthetic formalism directly derives from Kant’s aesthetics. This direct legacy seems a justifiable one since whatever else beauty is taken to be in Kant’s Third Critique, an invariant feature remains firm: beauty is always formal. What does this mean? It means that the aesthetic judgment of beauty must concern itself with form in the object (shape, arrangement of parts, and surface) and not with the content because the latter could be connected with interest (even a colour could be infected with interest and downgraded to the status of agreeable, according to classical formalism). However, the formalists (Clive Bell, Roger Fry, Clement Greenberg and Jerome Stolnitz among others more or less moderate formalists in the contemporary philosophy of art) seem to be more Kantian than Kant himself. They reject the relevance of cognitive and moral judgments in art appreciation and don't distinguish between beauty in art and natural beauty. Unlike them, Kant acknowledges this distinction between natural beauty and art's beauty and reserves the "free beauty" (pure beauty) only for the aesthetic appreciation of beautiful things in nature (with several exceptions like the designs a la grecque and music without a theme or without words). He also introduces "dependent beauty" as a legitimate kind of beauty which can be encountered in art only.

²²⁹ This statement appears at the beginning of Hegel’s Aesthetics: Lectures of Fine Art, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975. The line immediately follows Hegel’s claim that beauty of art is higher than the beauty of nature (since it is born in spirit).

²³⁰ Arthur Danto, “Beauty and Morality”, in Bill Beckley and David Shapiro (eds.), Uncontrollable Beauty: Toward a New Aesthetics, Allworth Press, NY, 1998, pp. 25-38.

²³¹ There are, of course, few exceptions from that “rule”: for instance Adrian Piper defends the appropriateness of Kantian aesthetics in theorizing political art (interview with Adrian Piper, conducted by Maurice Berger for Afterimage, Duke University Press, Durham and London, 1998, p. 226).

When he refers to free or pure beauty he always points to natural, pure beauty and not to art (his well-known examples are: flowers (especially roses), birds (the parrot, the bird of paradise, and the humming-bird) and a lot of crustaceans in the ocean. This does not mean that the whole Kantian philosophy of art is identical with his theory of beauty even if a consequence of this theory (which became popular later on) is that art had to be by definition beautiful or aesthetically pleasing.

Unlike the "Kantian" formalists, Kant distinguished between beauties of nature (pure beauties) and beauties of art (adherent beauties), and recognized that cognitive and moral judgments can be relevant to artistic evaluations (to judging beauty in art). Even political engaged artists and theorists (e.g. Adrian Piper) would say that what Kant's aesthetic theory holds regarding the status of art (except the part concerned with "the pure judgment of beauty") is in fact very generous.²³² From Kant's acceptance of moral and cognitive in the evaluation of art (but not of natural beauty), “we can infer exactly nothing about what sorts of objects get to be identified as art. We can have Kantian-style aesthetic experiences of all sorts of things, including agitprop political art, without violating Kantian strictures.”²³³

²³² Interview with Adrian Piper, conducted by Maurice Berger for Afterimage, Duke University Press, Durham and London, 1998, p. 226

To some extent Adrian Piper is right: Kant himself has pointed out that “all artistic beauty is dependent beauty” (see section 48 in his Critique of Aesthetic Judgment). Beauty is conceptless and functionless for Kant only in nature. We don’t need any concept of what kind of thing is the object meant to be. But with art is different. Kant says that when we encounter beauty in art “then we must first base it on a concept of what the thing is [meant] to be, since art always presupposes a purpose in the cause (and its causality).”²³⁴ This shows that Kant’s aesthetics of art differs greatly from his aesthetics of nature. The treatment of the aesthetic in Kant’s philosophy of art is certainly far from conclusive, but one thing is without doubt: “it is epistemological as well as political through and through. Several intellectuals... have been able to claim the reverse and to assert that the aesthetics of Kant is ‘free from cognitive and ethical consequences’, but this is their problem not Kant’s.”²³⁵ Political art could be theorized within a Kantian philosophy of beauty, as a relevant example of ‘dependent beauty’ but not as free (pure) beauty. In order to aesthetically judge a piece of political art you need unavoidably to take into consideration its conceptual content: the ideas it embodies, its aboutness (which actually makes it a dependent beauty) and the teleological aspect of it (its functions). In other words, political art is dependently beautiful in the sense that a certain function of a thing and the way in which that function is fulfilled makes us grasp that thing as beautiful. Dependent beauty is not only a matter of subsuming a thing under a concept (as some interpret Kant’s aesthetic theory) but it is closely connected with the fulfilling properly a function in a certain manner (just fulfilling the function would not be sufficient).

²³³ Ibidem.

²³⁴ Immanuel Kant, The Critique of Judgment, trans. Werner S. Pluhar, Indianapolis: Hackett, 1987.

²³⁵ Paul de Man, “Aesthetic Ideology”, University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis/London, 1997, p. 106.

Some contemporary aestheticians claim that only the judgment of free beauty remains within the aesthetic realm, while the judgment of dependent beauty (being an impure judgment) does not. Several questions are unavoidable: is dependent beauty a concept that is superfluous for aesthetic theory? Is dependent beauty a subspecies of free beauty? Can we judge an object dependently beautiful without judging it freely beautiful? My short answers are “no” for the first two questions and “yes” for the third one. The detailed answers will be developed in what follows.

To start with, the aesthetic judgment of dependent beauty we made need not be grounded in the first place in any judgment of free beauty and this independence still remains within the aesthetic realm. From the fact that something (political art in our case) may be dependently beautiful without being freely beautiful does not follow (as it is held by many) neither that the judgment of dependent beauty is made on non-aesthetic grounds nor that it is a non-genuine aesthetic judgment.²³⁶

We cannot reduce our pleasures in experiencing art to immediate/pure pleasure (there are other kinds of pleasures that count). Kant also admits that “something must be more than merely tastefully pleasant in order to please as a work of art”.²³⁷ As Gadamer puts it: “this thesis shows clearly how little a formal aesthetic of taste corresponds to Kantian idea... Kant’s demonstration that the beautiful pleases without a concept does not gainsay the fact that only the beautiful things that speak meaningfully to us evokes our total interest.”²³⁸ But Kant still insists in the paragraph 48 that in order to judge natural beauty, we need no concept of what kind of thing an object is meant to be. Even if I don’t agree with this requirement and I will have more to say about this issue later on, it should be mentioned that the term “beauty” must amount to something different in art cases than in other cases (non-art cases but still aesthetic cases). We need to clearly state that natural beauty and beauties which we find in art are not experienced identically (and their effects on us are quite different). In the appreciation of natural beauty, there is little connection with thought or thinking that explains its existence; whereas with art pieces the beautiful is explained by the thought that is necessary to be grasped in order to appreciate their beauty.²³⁹

²³⁶ For instance, Malcolm Budd holds that an object cannot be judged dependently beautiful without being firstly judged freely beautiful: “the judgment of free beauty is a ‘pure’ judgment of taste, so any aesthetic judgment must have at its heart a judgment of free beauty which is based upon nothing but the hedonic response in the object caused by a conceptually thin experience of the object” (Malcolm Budd, quoted in Philip Mallaband, ‘Understanding Kant’s Distinction between Free and Dependent Beauty’, The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 52, No. 206, Jan 2002, p.72). Christopher Janaway claims that if a person experiences something aesthetically then he will allow a free play of his/her imagination and understanding which causes the feeling of pleasure – aesthetic pleasure (based on the perception of the formal purposiveness without a purpose which the subject experiences in that thing). So aesthetic pleasure is the appropriate hedonistic response caused by the experience of the object’s aesthetic qualities. This is the ground for the aesthetic judgment of free beauty. In short, Janaway believes that dependent beauty (an intellectualized response) starts from the perception of the object’s aesthetic qualities which gives aesthetic pleasure (free beauty). So the judgment of dependent beauty is based both on hedonic response and intellectual response (the intellectual response is not enough in responding to dependent beauty). Philip Mallaband, ‘Understanding Kant’s Distinction between Free and Dependent Beauty’, The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 52, No. 206, Jan 2002, p.72.

²³⁷ Immanuel Kant, The Critique of Judgment, trans. Werner S. Pluhar, Indianapolis: Hackett, 1987, par. 48.

The relationship between free and dependent beauty seems to be controversial enough, inspiring Kant’s critics to react from both analytic and continental philosophical aesthetics. Some critics see the distinction totally misplaced (a mistake) in Kant’s systematic philosophical aesthetics. Depending on their orientation some hold that the privileged aesthetic position given to the free beauty is “dangerous” on the grounds that “it concentrates on aesthetics to the point of leaving us without an adequate philosophy of art”.²⁴⁰ Also Gadamer argues that it “seems impossible to do justice to art if aesthetics is founded on the ‘pure judgment of taste’ – unless the criterion of taste is made merely a precondition... Here (in Kant’s paragraph 16) the standpoint of taste is so far from being a mere precondition that, rather, it claims to exhaust the nature of aesthetic judgment and protect it from being limited by ‘intellectual’ criteria.”²⁴¹

Other theorists, like Ruth Lorand, Nick Zangwill or Christopher Janaway tend to stress the primacy of free beauty over the dependent beauty in the sense that “we must be able to ²³⁸ Hans Georg Gadamer, Truth and Method, Continuum, London and New York, 2004, p. 42.

²³⁹ Arthur Danto, “The Abuse of Beauty”, Deadalus, Vol. 131, No. 4, (Fall 2002), p. 53.

²⁴⁰ Denis Dutton, “The Experience of Art is Paradise Regained: Kant on Free and Dependent Beauty”, The British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 34, No. 3, July, 1994, p. 231.

²⁴¹ Hans Georg Gadamer, Truth and Method, London and New York: Bloomsbury, 1989, p. 42.

appreciate free beauty if we are to appreciate any beauty.”²⁴² There is even a more radical position stating that dependent beauty is not beauty at all (but nevertheless this conception is obviously unacceptable since its consequence would be the removal from Kant’s aesthetics of almost everything we would designate as works of art).²⁴³ Nick Zangwill argued that: “we must be able to appreciate free beauty if we are to appreciate any beauty. The primacy claim is that without a conception of free beauty, no other beauty would be accessible to us. We can only conceive of one because we can conceive of the other. There could not be people who cared only about dependent beauty but not about free beauty. Our love of free beauty is, as it were, the ground from which our love of dependent beauty springs.”²⁴⁴

Zangwill fails to provide an explanation of why the dependent beauty cannot be appreciated without any mediation of free beauty. He clearly states “I’m not sure how to argue for the primacy thesis” but continues to argue for works of artistic merit which excel in free beauty in the first place.²⁴⁵ It is not satisfactory to find out that free beauty is always prior to dependent one and we all begin to respond aesthetically only to what confronts our senses directly and immediately. Art abounds in example of works of artistic merit without excelling in free beauty. For a meaningful beauty (political art’s beauty) the pleasure type of response we ascribe to free beauty is not enough. However, Kant does not claim that dependent beauty is based on free beauty. All Kant says is that dependent beauty is somehow inferior to pure/free beauty (otherwise why would he say that a church is “merely” a dependent beauty?) Fortunately, there are theorists like Denis Dutton who acknowledges that Kant is “burdened with a contradiction” and proposes to discard the idea of free beauty. He seems to gain some ²⁴² Nick Zangwill, “Beauty”, in Jerrold Levinson (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of Aesthetics, Oxford University Press, 2005, p. 334.

²⁴³ Denis Dutton, “The Experience of Art is Paradise Regained: Kant on Free and Dependent Beauty”, The British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 34, No. 3, July, 1994, p. 231.

²⁴⁴ Nick Zangwill, “Beauty”, in Jerrold Levinson (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of Aesthetics, Oxford University Press, 2005, p. 335.

²⁴⁵ Idem, p. 336.

support from Gadamer's considerations presented in "Truth and Method", according to which "Kant's deepest philosophic difficulty is not with dependent, but with free beauty."²⁴⁶

One might propose at this point to reconcile free beauty and dependent beauty by the means of a sort of Wittgenstein "aspect seeing": the receiver pays attention to formal purposiveness (in the case of free beauty) and attention is switched for whatever the dependent beauty entails. It does not matter how "peaceful" and diplomatic this solution may appear, since it is totally inconsistent with the Kantian project concerning beauty in "Critique of Judgment": "The free/dependent distinction cannot be wholly a matter of mode of attention, apprehension, or choosing a viewpoint, because this would amount to psychologizing the beautiful, which for Kant is unthinkable."²⁴⁷

We can confidently say that pure beauty (free beauty) is indeed almost "legendary". It is impossible to imagine how we could appreciate a beautiful something (no matter if it is from art or from nature) in a conceptual vacuum. It seems almost awkward to say: "I don't care what X is, but it is beautiful". People are hardly heard saying after visiting an exhibition: "I don't care who painted it or what it was but it was so beautiful!" or "Even if what I thought it was a dove turns out to be a rat, it is still beautiful!" When we call something "beautiful" we normally reflect on what kind of an object X is, or possibly could be, or how it could be related to its context. There is no "mere", self-subsistent, de-contextualized, presuppositionless beauty. To be able to pursue this burdensome beauty (free/pure/self-subsistent) one has to be for the first time on earth (and even then, some context will matter in apprehending beauty, like the background in which she/he sees the flowers she likes).

In Dutton and Gadamer's spirit, I believe that the concept of "free beauty" is unmanageable and even unnecessary. As Dutton put it, "in the fullness of his investigations, Kant comes to the view that such experience for a cultivated, intelligent human being is an impossible ideal... free beauty is ultimately lost in the infinite complexities of art's dependence on its human context."²⁴⁸ The impure judgments of beauty are still aesthetic judgments. The conceptual deliberation is unavoidable when we apprehend beauty of any kind. Just to put some flesh on these theoretical bones, Yasumasa Morimura's beautiful political art would be helpful here as a clear example of conceptual and contextual beauty which cannot be apprehended as free/pure beauty at the same time. This proves that the fluctuation between free and dependent beauty is not easily possible as many Kantian commentators have thought.

²⁴⁶ Denis Dutton, 'The Experience of Art is Paradise Regained: Kant on Free and Dependent Beauty', available at <http://www.denisdutton.com/kant.htm> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

²⁴⁷ Idem.

Yasumasa Morimura is a Japanese appropriation artist (many times labeled as the masculine/Asian version of Cindy Sherman). He borrows images from historical art (ranging from Leonardo da Vinci to Frida Kahlo to Rembrandt and Manet) and over-imposes or inserts his own face or body into them. This operation is also undergone with photographs of Hollywood's pop stars. Morimura's art is nevertheless politically loaded. It raises questions regarding gender issues (masculine-feminine identity, opposing hetero-normativity), cultural identity, Western-Eastern dichotomies and prejudices, and challenges the beauty canons of the Western world. The artist's own body becomes a locus of the political. Morimura is not performing in the first place a show by the means of his impersonations – he is rather performing a task: to make you aware about the unjust distribution of success (all the stars he is impersonating are icons of the Western film industry or art history's masterpieces). The act of over-imposing his face on these pictures or paintings acquires a political significance: it confronts the viewer (especially the Western viewer) with the otherness' beauty and determines her to think more about the canons of ideal beauty and artistic success. Had Mona Lisa been an Asian man, would we have found her still beautiful?

²⁴⁸ Denis Dutton, 'The Experience of Art is Paradise Regained: Kant on Free and Dependent Beauty', available at <http://www.denisdutton.com/kant.htm> (last accessed 6 August 2013).

Figure 6. Morimura, Self-Portrait-After Marilyn Monroe, gelatine silver prints, 1996, the Saatchi Gallery.

Morimura's impersonations are intended to be at least two things: (a) art and (b) instances of a critical beauty, which somehow questions the "iconic metaphors of beauty". To appreciate this art pieces as "beautiful" we need to understand the concepts and ideas the artist has employed, the context (the cultural tradition, art history, the artist belonging to a specific culture) and so on. For instance, I personally don't find Leonardo da Vinci's Mona Lisa beautiful, even if I struggle to attend its formal qualities following the requirements of a purist aesthetic reception. It does not strike me as beautiful either at first glance or at the second or third.

But Morimura's Mona Lisa is beautiful for me (in a Kantian, dependent way) and by no means could it be apprehended as freely beautiful. To apprehend it as being freely beautiful would mean to miss its point entirely. Morimura's Mona Lisa is beautiful precisely because of what it represents, because of what it means. What this Mona Lisa means is strikingly different from da Vinci's one: from the formal point of view they resemble, but they are not really indiscernible as Duchamp's Fountain and a regular toilet are. Morimura has just appropriated da Vinci's image but the meaning of his work is a totally different one. However, it is very plausible for some of us to find da Vinci's Mona Lisa non-beautiful and Morimura's beautiful. Morimura's impersonation is beautiful because it lets us know what it means what we see (and it also lets us know from where, with what purpose and how could we understand the author's artistic gesture). Morimura forces da Vinci's Mona Lisa to become a self-portrait of the artist in drag "injecting a Western icon with the spirit of Onnagata – a Japanese Kabuki theatre's tradition of cross-dressing."²⁴⁹ Apprehending the "new", Morimura's Mona Lisa is still pleasurable, but it is a different kind of pleasure, an interested one: informed by what the new portrait comes to mean and why. Morimura's Mona Lisa is beautiful because it is such and such. If we experience it in a conceptual vacuum (as the purist beauty requires) then we miss its point and its beauty altogether. In other words, if we see it without any conceptual content and without having a purpose of its function in mind, it does not seem beautiful at all (not even freely beautiful).

What I have set forth until now was an attempt to reconsider the Kantian theory of beauty. What I intended to illustrate is that the beauty of political art can be understood by means of Kant's theory of "dependent beauty" without judging it in the first place as freely beautiful. Dependent beauty is not a subspecies of free beauty but a different kind of beauty. In other words, the spectator's intellectual pleasure in appreciating this beauty can stand alone as an aesthetic judgment of dependent beauty. There is no need for the pure judgment of taste to complement the cognitive judgment. In this case free beauty does not have any primacy over the dependent beauty (actually I'm wondering if such a thing as free beauty really exists).

²⁴⁹ From White Cube, <http://www.whitecube.com/exhibitions/morimuraphotographs> (last accessed 10 January 2011).

To sum up, I am not sure whether Kant was so mistaken in his theorizing the beautiful (in what regards the dependent beauty). His philosophy of aesthetic judgment has been attacked many times in contemporary art theory (sometimes rightly but sometimes unjustly). Marcia Muelder Eaton talks about two senses of “beauty” entrenched in our language: contextual beauty and Kantian beauty.²⁵⁰ She holds that the attributions of beauty to objects or events are mediated and contextual: “beauty is a contextual property deeply connected with factual beliefs and moral attitudes”, and “the pleasure required for the judgment that something is beautiful diminishes, disappears, or even is replaced by displeasure as one’s beliefs or values change.”²⁵¹ For example, I used to consider X beautiful but after learning or discovering that X is dangerous or immoral, I no longer consider it beautiful (it does not give me pleasure anymore).

Eaton rightly argues that beauty is not an immediate feeling, disinterested and unchanging. If something is beautiful, then the pleasure in seeing it is not enough to account for its beauty. Our ethical and cognitive considerations do matter in considering something beautiful. These considerations can replace the pleasure we take in admiring beauty both in nature and in arts. She uses a well-chosen example meant to undermine Kant’s universalistic theory of natural beauty. As we have seen, Kant talks about “free beauty” only referring to examples from nature (not from art). Eaton invokes the purple loosestrife – an exotic, flowering plant – which for her seems so beautiful and “eye catching” while her landscape designer friend finds it ugly and repulsive (the friend has even a poster with this plant on her office door urging us to wipe it up because it endangers other plants). With this example, Eaton wants to show that there are always conflicting perceptions of beauty (even in nature, where free beauty is supposed to rule the day) and what we consider beautiful depends on our set of beliefs, prejudices, previous knowledge, and the context (social, economical, and so on) in which we encounter that object: “and then I think again of my ecologist friend. Does she not see what I see when she looks to the purple loosestrife? Is she truly unseduced by the lush color? How, if Kant is right, does she see ugliness where I see beauty? And how, if Kant is right, do changes in my beliefs or moral assessments sometimes produce a change in my aesthetic views?”²⁵² I can hardly disagree with this point; indeed, it has been a mistake for aestheticians to take the purist, “free” sense of beauty (conceptless, functionless and disinterested) as the paradigmatic aesthetic concept. However, I do not consider that we should learn to live with this duality: contextual beauty and Kantian beauty (as Eaton suggests). When Eaton refers to Kantian beauty, she mainly touches upon that part from Kant in which the Eighteenth century philosopher discusses the “free beauty” (mainly the moment of universality and disinterestedness). So what she calls “Kantian beauty” and opposes to “contextual beauty” is just an incomplete picture of the Kantian theory of beauty. Kant claims that a pure aesthetic pleasure is always “unmediated”, but this is not all that he holds. An aesthetic (dependent, non-pure) pleasure is still aesthetic and is still pleasurable.

²⁵⁰ Marcia Muelder Eaton, “Kantian and Contextual Beauty”, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Blackwell Publishing, Vol. 57, No. 1, Winter, 1999.

²⁵¹ Idem, p. 13.

4.4. Functional Beauty: Beauty and Function in Political Art

In what follows, I will focus on functionality in relation to beauty (dependent beauty a thing has as a thing with a certain function). A traditional, conservative aesthetician would be eager to argue that political art is neither beautiful nor aesthetic art:

1. Because of its unappealing look, generally, political art does not give us immediate/aesthetic pleasure (with several exceptions, like Guernica, which might give us immediate aesthetic pleasure).

²⁵² Marcia Muelder Eaton, ‘Kantian and Contextual Beauty’, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Blackwell Publishing, Vol. 57, No. 1, Winter, 1999, p. 11.

2. The kind of pleasure political art occasions in us (if it occasions) is not a disinterested one.
3. Political art is a functional art. Political art's main function is to criticize hegemony and to increase awareness about the abuses of power. In doing this, political art exhibits aesthetic properties which are not beautiful because these properties just follow the realization of political art's main function/purpose. Its main function is not to provoke an aesthetic experience but to increase awareness. Then, in general, political art is not an aesthetic art. Even if in some cases (with some exceptions) political art may possess other relevant aesthetic qualities, political art lacks the most important one: beauty (the paradigmatic category of traditional aesthetics).

Up to this point I have argued that in spite of its unappealing look, political art is many times beautiful (rejecting 1) and, that the aesthetic pleasure (as dependent, non-pure pleasure) in apprehending political art is still aesthetic and is still pleasurable (rejecting 2). This means that political-critical art is dependently beautiful. Dependent beauty of a thing (according to Kant) is among other things, the beauty that it has as a thing with certain function. I want to suggest that beauty in political art's case is a functional beauty; it is a combination of what this art does (the proper function it fulfils) and of the way in which it fulfils that function (with daring, wit, courage, force, relevance). Daring, wit and courage (as I have argued in chapter 2) are also aesthetic properties (non-perceptual but still aesthetic and still beautiful). We don't appreciate dependent beauty just for the sake of it or for the pleasure it occasions but for what it does and for what is meant. The fact that we don't appreciate it for what is customarily prescribed (immediacy, disinterestedness, uselessness) does not make it less aesthetic. There are various species of beauty (not only that accepted in official aesthetic theory). A beauty which is conjoined with function is still a kind of beauty and is still aesthetic.

This does not mean that all art is functional but political-critical art certainly is. If for other arts (let's say "fine" arts as opposed to functional arts-even if I don't endorse this distinction) is difficult to identify their proper function this is not the case with political art. We identify political art as political art with respect to its function (otherwise, why calling it political art?). We can appreciate/evaluate individual instances of political art and reason how well they express (work out) their proper function. Political art is both functional and beautiful. Function does not nullify beauty. On the contrary, the fact that we know that a disharmonic feature is displayed in a piece of art with the purpose of rekindling our hearts makes that feature a beautiful one, even if it does not look so at first sight. Functionality informs (in the end) the way the object looks to us. X can look beautiful to us if we know that its function is to do something good and healthy. A horrifying face of someone suffering depicted in a movie is not pleasant to look at but looks beautiful to us once we know its purpose in that piece of art.

Figure 7: scene from The Elephant Man, directed by David Lynch

The fact that an aesthetic property is displayed in a certain way (even in an unappealing one) is meant to fulfil the function of political art. Once we understand that function, and the ways in which that function is achieved through those features which are displayed in the way they are displayed, we can see the work of beauty.

In the pre-aesthetic era (before the 18th century), in classical philosophy's tradition, beauty has been understood as fitness for a purpose/function. In classical Greek thought an object might be called beautiful (kalos) with reference to a purpose and non-beautiful with reference to another purpose. In this paradigm, what makes something beautiful is the fitness for purpose. A house is beautiful if it keeps warm during the winter and cold during the summer; a shoe is beautiful if the foot feels good in it, and so on. As Allan Parsons and Glen Parsons have recently documented the obscured tradition of classical thought regarding the beauty issue, we can clearly distinguish between strong and weak versions of functional beauty.

The strong version holds that beauty is fitness for function: "all things are good and beautiful in relation to those purposes for which they are well adapted, bad and ugly in relation to those for which they are ill adapted" (Xenophon in Memorabilia) and "whatever is useful we call beautiful" (Plato, Greater Hippias)²⁵³. The weak classical version of beauty posits that fitness for function is "one beauty among the others"; though fitness it is not necessary for an object to be considered beautiful, it could be sufficient for this. In other words: if the object X is fitted for function Z, this is a sufficient (though not necessary) condition to consider X beautiful.²⁵⁴ Yet, both strong and weak classical versions of functional beauty seem to me inappropriate to offer an account of functional beauty in political-critical art. Unlike other things in this world which may not have a specific function, political-critical art has one but this does not mean that the simple achievement of its function (functions) renders it automatically beautiful. Nor does it mean that fulfilment alone of function is a sufficient condition for political art to be appreciated as beautiful. In short, functional beauty is not merely fitness to function (x is looking fit for its function) as some contemporary aestheticians claim (Parsons, Carlson, Davies).

²⁵³ Allan Carlson and Glen Parsons, Functional Beauty, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 2008, p. 2.

²⁵⁴ For a detailed distinction between weak and strong versions of beauty in classical philosophy, see Allan Carlson and Glen Parsons, Functional Beauty, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 2008, p. 2.

There are many things which exhibit properties which look fit for their primary function but we cannot claim that they are beautiful solely on this ground. Not all concerns with functionality are also aesthetic concerns. But there are objects which are both clearly functional and possess beauty. Davies says that we judge a Swiss watch as functionally more beautiful than a quartz watch even though they both fulfil the same function of time showing. The Swiss one is aesthetically and functionally more beautiful because of the manner in which its properties fulfil the function of time showing (Davies says that we consider the Swiss model functionally more beautiful because of the skill and craftsmanship that “goes into its achieving that function”). This means that merely fulfilling the function is not the only reason of why a Swiss model is functionally beautiful. Anyway, according to Davies, and I tend to agree, this idea of our reaction to beautiful Swiss watches fits better Kant’s dependent beauty than Parsons and Carlson’s internalist approach. Davies does not find Kant’s position particularly convincing because he conceives functional beauty differently. For Parsons, Carlson and Davies fitness for function is not a necessary condition but a sufficient one for an object to be considered as functionally beautiful. For Kant, fulfilling the function would never be sufficient for an item to be called functionally beautiful.

Knowing the function of an art piece must change the way the object looks to us. Knowledge of function affects the aesthetic appearance of the object. Not anyone agrees with that. Even starting with the Eighteenth century any possible connection between beauty and utility is seriously questioned. Burke’s study “The philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful” (1757) is an important piece of textual evidence. He contends that looking fit for a function is neither a necessary nor a sufficient condition for beauty. Looking fit is not a necessary condition for beauty since objects can appear beautiful without appearing fit – so the strong version of functional beauty is false. The weaker version is also false for Burke: to look fit for a purpose is not even a sufficient condition for something to be considered beautiful. Here is why. He offers the famous counter-example of the pig’s snout. A pig’s snout is so well adapted and it looks well adapted for digging and rooting but it cannot be considered “beautiful”. There is no logical connection between beauty and looking fit. A pig is not beautiful.²⁵⁵ But Alison (one of Burke’s early critics) is offering a counter-argument: the pig’s snout may displease for its dirty appearance and smell (in other words it is not immediately beautiful or immediately pleasant at sight) but nonetheless contains a beauty, even if it is one that is obscured, in its suitability of form to function: “We fail to call pigs beautiful because they lack those varieties of beauty that strike us immediately.”²⁵⁶

Political-critical art is somehow like Burke’s pig. We have to look at it with a kind of awareness and not immediately to be struck by its beauty. It is not an immediate pleasure we take in its apprehension but a pleasure which arises from a reflective contemplation and deliberative thinking. It is always important in our aesthetic experience to understand the function of the object we perceive. This understanding of the function of that object will alter/change our perception of it. Fitness for function can produce a kind of aesthetic pleasure once we understand the way in which the object looks fit for the function. Now, I am aware of the fact that in this perspective of beauty we could end up with some strange-looking examples of beauty (like the pig's snout). But, on the other hand, I see nothing unacceptable about that (neither for political art nor for beauty).

²⁵⁵ “How well fitted is the wolf for running and leaping! How admirably is the lion armed for battle! But will anyone therefore call... the wolf and the lion beautiful animals?” (Burke, Philosophical inquiry into the origin of our ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, quoted in Allan Carlson and Glen Parsons, Functional Beauty, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 2008, p. 18).

²⁵⁶ Alison, quoted in Allan Carlson and Glen Parsons, Functional Beauty, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 2008, p. 23.

Figure 8. Yanagi Miwa, My Grandmothers Series, begun in 1999. The Japanese critical artist uses post-production photo editing, make-up, costumes and elements of décor to stage the great event of self perception and projection. The aim of this project is to critically examine and question the image of femininity and prettiness which happens to be the official norm in Japanese consumer culture. The beauty of these grandmothers rests in their willingness to express a personal opinion on the current state of affairs regardless of how old they get and how much their physical appearance declines.

An odd-looking appearance may be very supportive for the re-emergence of beauty as a critical category – like Yanagi Miwa or Morimura's impersonations are. The beauty of this impersonation rests exactly in the political critiques of the Western idea of beauty (x is beautiful because is critical). Morimura uses a Western image of beauty (Marilyn Monroe) just to subvert it and criticized it. In doing this he actually produces a “new” beauty, a critical beauty (“Marilyn Monroe with Asian face of the artist”) with a critical function. The beauty of this impersonation does not occasion in the viewer an immediate and disinterested pleasure but on the contrary. We experience it as a beautiful piece of art for the function (political-critical) it performs. Then, beauty is neither concept-less or immediately pleasant at sight nor separated by functionality.

Beside the critical function of beauty within political art, I argue for the political relevance of some other functions of beauty, namely: healing, inspiring generosity, allowing sentiment and emotion to express (perhaps even to bring forth tears), and a rhetorical function as well (I don’t discuss them all here but they will be the focus of my next research). Unlike the commonsensical understanding of beauty in traditional aesthetic theory as distanced, useless, immediately eye catching and pleasing at sight, contextually and conceptually informed beauty is purposeful and its impacts are detected in our responses to it. Beauty is always meaningful and only understood as meaningfulness does matter in political art pieces. As Marcia Eaton has pointed out, if we make beauty pure it stops mattering.²⁵⁷

Political art is beautiful for what it does, for how it acts and for the reasons it acts how it acts. For example, several contemporary artists recycle plastic bottles from the ocean or from New York streets and turn them into artistry (even in beautiful forms).²⁵⁸ The beauty of these pieces lies not necessarily in the objects themselves or in the way these objects are arranged and displayed to meet spectators’ eyes, but also (mostly) in our reflection about those objects. The fact that we know what they are made from, for what reason they are displayed as they are displayed, and with what purpose renders them beautiful and not the mere appearance of them or the immediate pleasure they occasion in our senses. We know what the function of these artistic forms is and the fact that we know their function renders them beautiful to us. They are dependently beautiful things that are beautiful as things with certain functions. Their functions are to express certain ideas of social or environmental justice. Beauty of an idea always has consequences in our lives in a way in which the beauty of the mere appearance has not.

²⁵⁷ Marcia Muelder Eaton, ‘Kantian and Contextual Beauty’, The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Blackwell Publishing, Vol. 57, No. 1, 1999.

²⁵⁸ Source: <http://artthreat.net/2010/11/convergence-lumenhouse/> (accessed 10 January 2011).

4.5. Conclusions

As Kathleen Higgins suggests, beauty may exactly serve the goals from which it seems to distract by creating an indispensable mental awareness which is unavoidable for political-critical art.²⁵⁹ Even in the case in which the art object of spatial and perceptual appearance is replaced by the work of art as analytic proposition (via Conceptual Art), the beauty of the concept is still in place and we still find the idea beautiful if we have reasons enough to find it so. At the same time, the conceptual art piece is political and beautiful because ideas do have aesthetic qualities and value exactly like some non-art objects have. This does not mean that these ideas are universally beautiful. Some people's beautiful art is for others just plain vandalism (political graffiti's case). Elaine Scarry wants to connect beauty with symmetry and with distributive justice (in loving beauty we love symmetry and in loving symmetry, we love justice which consists in the "symmetry of everyone's relation to one another"). But this is not accurate because "what counts as symmetry in aesthetics is constantly changing and secondly, if the symmetry varies, then the symmetry that pleases me in a beautiful object may represent an oppressive arrangement to you."²⁶⁰

Politics becomes beauty's opponent. It seems right to consider this as long as beauty is envisaged as symmetry, surface, shared values which defend and promote the reproduction of subject-consumers conditioned by the normative inclusions and exclusions. As Nehamas put ²⁵⁹ See Kathleen Higgins, "Whatever Happened to Beauty? A Response to Danto", Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, No. 54, 1996, pp. 281-284.

²⁶⁰ Alexander Nehamas, "The Return of the Beautiful: Morality, Pleasure, and the Value of Uncertainty", in The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 58, No. 4, Fall 2000, pp. 393-403.

it, “the reason we cannot answer the question why is beauty valuable is that it is a bad question, forced upon us because we take beauty to be a distinct feature of things, something like symmetry or grace: How can we love a feature that often characterizes objects that serve oppression or falsehood?”²⁶¹

It cannot be the case that beauty’s main function is to powerfully and superficially attract in the detriment of its relevance or purposiveness. How beauty looks is less noteworthy in comparison with what beauty does and means. Political art usually exhibits difficult beauties, queer beauties and obscure beauties which, nevertheless, do not seem to be pleasant at the first sight. But all these strange-looking beauties comport themselves like a reminder for tolerance, acceptance and understanding. Sometimes their purpose/function is to heal a wounded consciousness, to quicken the viewer’s mind or to correct behaviours. Something truly beautiful could be seen in many and, sometimes, even conflicting ways, but not as just a cataleptic pleasure. Beauty is often not easy to recognize at the first glance needing to pay a closer reflection and deliberation. Works that don’t look beautiful may turn out to be beautiful once we understand why we appreciate them. My suggestion is that beauty is not “useless” and “merely pleasant to look at” but can be political and critical through and through.

Beauty is not meant for being merely looked at and be pleased because beauty can change something in the world if it changes something in the mind of the beholder. Beauty is not at odds with critical awareness but on the contrary, it could be one of its legitimate expressions if we understand beauty differently. In general lines, beauty is that which occasions an evaluative and worthwhile experience in virtue of the way something looks sounds, functions or is configured. There are many kinds of beauty and it would be a mistake to conceive that there is a single, peculiar quality which all kinds of beauty have in common (like unity, symmetry simplicity and whatever else aestheticians have pointed out over the years). If we love something we will find that something beautiful in spite of its unpleasant look because beauty always emerges from this kind of interaction between a person and an object. This does not necessarily mean that beauty is a subjective impression. Bad things are not usually lovable. I don't know if aesthetics and ethics are one (as some contemporaries, following Wittgenstein, posit) but perhaps aesthetic values and ethical values are parts of the same approach (without pretending that they are in harmony with each other or that they are always compatible). Beauty's pursue may not be much different from acquisition of virtue.

²⁶¹ Alexander Nehamas, “The Return of the Beautiful: Morality, Pleasure, and the Value of Uncertainty”, in The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 58, No. 4, Fall 2000, p. 402.

CHAPTER 5. THE EFFECTIVENESS QUESTION: IS CRITICAL ART POLITICALLY EFFECTIVE?

“Aesthetics matter-but it needn’t be seen in opposition to efficacy”
(Duncombe & Lambert, An Open Letter to Critics Writing on Political Art, 2012)²⁶²

This chapter attempts to answer several interrelated questions. Each of which has to do with the issue of effectiveness in political-critical art’s case. In order to grasp the meaning of what does it mean to make effective political art it is necessary to answer first to several interrelated questions. There is no single or simple answer to what does effective mean. In order to clarify whether political-critical art is effective or not, this chapter will address the following set of questions: In the first section, I investigate what does effective mean, and whether there are different types of effectiveness. The second part asks what the reasons for denying or affirming the political effectiveness of critical art are. The third section questions whether political-critical art is most effective within an institutional setting, or on the contrary, outside of it. The fourth part explores the subjects to whom political-critical art must be addressed in order for it to be most effective. The fifth section looks into the kind of mechanisms of production and distribution of political-critical art which make it most effective. I will investigate how political art is done or, in a Marxist spirit, how the piece is done in this or that mode of production. Finally the last section deals with the question of political-critical effectiveness within social movements and revolutions.

I attempt to support the view that political-critical art can be effective in many ways and that is the reason why the question of ‘effectiveness’ should be addressed from many perspectives (because to be politically effective does not only mean, for example, “to stop a war”, to defeat hegemony or to make a politician resign). Political-critical art can be effective even when it does not change concrete states of affairs because political engagement can take place in different force fields: not only in the streets and institutions but also in the remote zones of our sensibility.

²⁶² Source: <http://artisticactivism.org/2012/10/an-open-letter-to-critics-writing-about-political-art/>.

5.1. Political Art's Effectiveness: "What Does "Effective" Mean?" and "Are There Different Types of Effectiveness?"

The Vera List Center for Art and Politics (New York City) organized in October 2012 a conference where the leading question has been "How Can Art Affect Political Change?" The speakers have addressed several crucial issues regarding the complex relationship between activism and artistic production. They also have addressed several questions regarding the issue of effectiveness in political-critical art's case, such as: "Is political art effective when it fulfils basic needs (food, accommodation etc)" (Marisa Jahn) or "Why are we asking art to effect political change? Why we don't ask artists, art workers or citizens? Why this displacement of agency from people to art? What is the current relationship between creative practice and political activism?" (Benjamin Young).²⁶³

However, before clarifying these convoluted issues later on in this chapter, it has to be firstly stated what counts as "effectiveness" ("political effectiveness"). It seems that this question has been not answered within The Vera List Center for Art and Politics' conference. The problem is that the question of effectiveness cannot be answered in general. We cannot simply claim that X is politically effective when Z, because being "effective" can signify more than one thing. Then, the question is: Can there be a stable point of reference to assert if something is politically effective or, rather what counts as "effective" has more than one stable point of reference? This is an important step in my argument because often people untrained in art theory, as well as artists and theorists tend to disagree on the examples of politically effective art. For example, a recent issue from the mainstream art magazine Frieze, attempts to survey the answers from political artists, curators and art educators regarding “what constitutes an example of politically effective art”.²⁶⁴ The examples of politically effective art range from Pussy Riot (Russian group of political artists protesting against Putin-Medvedev’s political authority) to Laurie Jo Reynolds (who has worked successfully with prison reform activists to close a maximum security prison in Illinois) and to handmade decorations from remote rural areas which act critically in the sense that they emphasize “the suffocating female role models”.²⁶⁵ Thus, political effectiveness is not of one type and different instances of art count as political effective. What does “politically effective” mean then? It seems that being politically effective means more than one thing (at least three things):

²⁶³ Conference available online: <http://vimeo.com/51284714> (last accessed 7 August 2013).

(a) being politically effective means to change states of affairs in the world, as a consequence of political art’s campaigns, like closing the Illinois prison down by the governor after many artistic actions so-called LEGISLATIVE ART (art that intervenes in government system with the aim of concrete political change) organized by Laurie Jo Reynolds and other artists and activists.

(b) nothing concrete is done/changed but more and more people are aware of a troubled situation and attempt to do something in this respect (for example, Pussy Riot’s performances in the Cathedral of Christ the Saviour in Moscow against the president Vladimir Putin did not make Putin resign but increase awareness around the world about Putin’s abuses of power and about how human rights are infringed). The hegemony is not defeated but its abuses are made visible to the outside world. Art is effective in this case in the sense that it initiates conversations about social justice issues.

²⁶⁴ Frieze, <http://blog.frieze.com/art-and-politics-a-survey-part-1/>.

²⁶⁵ Sabine Vogel (2011), ‘Political Patterns-Changing Ornament’, Nafas Art Magazine, July

(c) some political-critical forms of creativity from artistic practice may be effective in the sense that they bring to the fore a moral dimension of a concrete situation (nothing “concrete” will change but our sensibility will be rekindled in such a way that opens our mind to imagine what if we would be in a difficult position, similar to that we acknowledge in political-critical art piece). In other words, political art can be effective if it fosters useful emotions and empathy.

I admit that the tripartite classification of political effectiveness presented above might not be complete. However, beside the different senses in which we can understand that critical art is politically effective, another important issue needs to be detailed at this point: independent of the sense in which we understand “political effectiveness”, it is not clear yet whether:

(1) political-critical art has some consequences in inspiring people to act in new ways and to change the state of affairs or, rather

(2) political-critical art is merely re-enacting what has already happened in the street (an artistic re-enactment of a public revolt that already took place in the public sphere). In other words, is political art “critical” and revolutionary when “something troubling happens as a direct reaction to that worrying situation or its criticality and “revolutionaries” consists in re-enacting what has already happened in terms of revolution and critical reaction in the street”?²⁶⁶

²⁶⁶ Frieze, <http://blog.frieze.com/art-and-politics-a-survey-part-1/> (accessed July 2012).

5.2. What Reasons Are For Denying or Affirming the Political Effectiveness of Critical Art?

Contemporary political-critical art is many times evaluated and judged in terms of social-political usefulness and effectiveness, disregarding the questions of aesthetic/artistic value. Curator Nato Thomson has recently argued that the question for political-critical art is no longer “But is it art?” but a different one: “Is it useful?”²⁶⁷ The “is it useful?” question actually means “is it effective as political-critical art?” Many activists and critical theorists claim that it does not even matter if political art is art or not, as long as it fulfils its political-critical function effectively.²⁶⁸ In other words, for some theorists, political-critical art is effective if it fulfils a political function successfully (for instance, it is effective if it gives food to the poor; if it provides “a good model of collaboration” among artists who work in an art collective as opposed to the successful format of the individual, ‘genius’ artist; if it brings to the fore the hidden racism and so on).

Yet, there is also another tendency to question critical art’s political effectiveness on the grounds that art is powerless or functionless and “it would never stop a war” because it has no chance to succeed in stopping injustices and raising awareness, as long as it is still preached in official museums and other art institutions as “a commercialized repetition of its historical precursors”.²⁶⁹ Art as resistance or critique is said to be just as meaningless from the point of view of its political effectiveness as commercial or decorative art is.²⁷⁰ Yet, even if

²⁶⁷ Thomson Nato, Living as Form: Socially Engaged Art from 1991-2011, Creative Time, New York, 2012, p. 16.

²⁶⁸ For instance Amy Mullin argues that for some contemporary theorists, the proper answer to the question “But is it art?” is “What does it matter?” (Amy Mullin, “Feminist Art and The Political Imagination”, Hypatia, Vol. 18, No. 4, Fall, 2003 <http://www.public.asu.edu/~kleong/activistarttheory.pdf>).

²⁶⁹ Hubert van den Berg, “On the Historiographic Distinction Between Historical and Neo-Avant-Garde”, in Dietrich Scheunemann (ed.), Avant-Garde / Neo-Avant-Garde, Rodopi Editions, Amsterdam - New York, 2005, p. 66.

²⁷⁰ I argue elsewhere that not all arts that are usually secluded in the area of the “ornamental” or “decorative” are a-political and powerless. Despite institutional silence, there is a long standing, home-made tradition of making political art by the means of ornaments or decorations. A carpet, for instance, is not always a textile floor this assertion is something heard frequently, I don't think it is accurate. As Hubert van den Berg convincingly argues, "...resistance, a revolt or a revolution, is not necessarily meaningless, when there is little or no chance of success or victory. The fundamental question rises here, whether the relevance of resistance should only be measured by its chance of success. Does not resistance, does not revolt possess always a moral dimension as well?"²⁷¹ This means that a revolution or a revolt has to be done when abuses of power and injustices are at stake, even if its chances to change that state of affairs are small or limited. The fact that a revolution is not successful in changing something does not mean that it is completely "ineffective" politically because, as I argue, political effectiveness is not just of one kind.

5.3. Is Political-Critical Art Most Effective Within an Institutional Setting or Outside of It?

As already mentioned, the question of effectiveness in political-critical art's case is addressed from many perspectives. One may ask if critical art is effective if it is produced and exhibited within the mainstream art institutions or if it is produced outside of them. Also, one may ask if critical art is most effective as activism or rather as exit or reclusiveness (we have to acknowledge that not all art produced outside of the mainstream art institutions is critical art). In other words, when is political-critical art effective? The answers are (a) when it acts progressively against power's mechanisms of domination from within that power, or (b) when covering but a way of spending time usefully, politically and critically. As we know, ornaments became inextricably bound up in discussions about taste and beauty. Yet, ornament does not necessarily talk about symmetry and harmony to satisfy a cataleptic aesthetics of pleasure but can talk about conflicts and injustices too. As Sabine Vogel argued, the ornament is increasingly being used as a means of criticism: "of suffocating female role models; of totalitarian political systems; of standardizing behavioural patterns, expectations and conventions" (see Maria Alina Asavei, "Functional Beauty and Handmade Political Art", in Art & Education, New York, 4 October 2012, source: <http://www.artandeducation.net/paper/functional-beauty-and-handmade-political-art/>).

²⁷¹ Hubert van den Berg, "On the Historiographic Distinction between Historical and Neo-Avant-Garde", in Dietrich Scheunemann (ed.), Avant-Garde / Neo-Avant-Garde, Rodopi Editions, Amsterdam - New York, 2005, p. 66.

it refuses any way of dealing directly with that power (art might be critical precisely because it refuses to seek to document, intervene or reflect the bad politics of the moment).

Let's take an example: Guerrilla Girls or Ai Weiwei's art are instances of the direct social and political activism while Miroslav Tichý's photographs did not overtly criticize the totalitarian regime through his photographs with naked or semi-naked women, even if he criticized the regime very harshly by refusing the official canon and preferring the mental institution instead of an artistic carrier.²⁷² His refusal to produce an art which respects the ideology of the communist party is more a form of critical "exit" than a form of direct form of "activism". His resistance and "criticism" reside in his willingness to live and create an art which is free of any ideological constraints. The women in bathing suits or in negligees are not what Tychy's art is all about. His art is motivated by his visceral and painful struggle to live and to 'see' freely and without distortion the two irreconcilable worlds: that imposed from above and that which he saw naturally, through the lens of his improvised camera.

Is his art critical and "effective" politically then? If we understand political-critical art's "effectiveness" only in terms of defeating the mechanisms of power, then Tichy's critical-"exit" type of political art is not effective. Yet, as I have argued, "effectiveness" does not exclusively mean defeating that which political art is critical about. In Tychy's art example, it is obvious that he did not overtly criticize the communist regime but what he did is slightly different: His photographs are documents of resistance in the sense that they capture the normality of human life with its romanticism, eroticism and innocence under the pressure of an abnormal political reality.

²⁷² Miroslav Tichy is a Moravian artist. As the curator Michael Hoppen writes, "Unwilling to subordinate to the political system he spent some eight years in prison and psychiatric wards for no reason, other than he was 'different' and considered subversive. Upon his release he became an outsider, occupying his time by obsessively taking photographs of the women of his home town, using homemade cameras constructed from tin cans, children's spectacle lenses, rubber bands, scotch tape and other junk found on the streets" (Michael Hoppen, 'Unique Photographs Previously Unseen in the UK', at Michael Hoppen Gallery).

Another crucial question would be whether it can be effective to make political work that functions within the mainstream art world (“preaching to the converted?”). A very interesting phenomenon, known as the “institutionalization of dissent”, started in the 80’s: the political, opposition art is gentrified by the mainstream culture and by its institutions. What at the beginning was intended to be “critical” suddenly becomes a pretended “mainstream”. This is not such a big surprise since the “enemy” looks familiar, being the hand that feeds the contemporary critical artists. As Lucy Lippard honestly puts it, “we were picketing the people we drank with and lived off. We were making art in a buyer’s market but not a consumer’s market. We were full of ‘mixed feelings’, because we wanted to be considered workers as everyone else and at the same time we were not happy when we saw our products being treated like everyone else’s, because deep down we know as artists we are special”²⁷³ In other words, there is a tendency to consider that critical art is de-politicized as soon as it is appropriated and integrated into the artworld. But is this so? Is the artworld a homogeneous field? Some political artists and critical theorists (like Oliver Ressler and Max Andrews) claim that there is no homogeneous artworld. Some artworlds are commercial and some are not; some artworlds are mainstream artworlds and others are marginal; some artworlds encourage more participatory art and others encourage traditional painting and sculpture and so on.

However, political-critical art continues to co-exist with the art of a globalized mainstream artworld which is fully developed providing distribution systems which integrate artists into the global market. But if an established distribution system rejects what it considers to be inconvenient art pieces both on political and aesthetic grounds, there will always be possible to organize a Salon des Refusés more or less fully developed in providing distribution. In other words, artists can choose various distribution systems, not necessarily the gallery, museum, university or the art magazine, which serve them best or constrain them least.²⁷⁴ Artists who are interested in the political effectiveness of their work would be rather content that their public is not the typical public of contemporary art galleries which has only a professional interest in art.²⁷⁵ It is difficult to criticize the art market while you are a prominent part of it. On the other hand, the separation between art market and critical-political art is not always a radical one because artists sought to express “varying degrees of opposition and autonomy toward the marketplace”²⁷⁶

²⁷³ Lucy Lippard, “Trojan Horses: Activist Art and Power”, in Sally Everett (ed.), Art Theory and Criticism, McFarland Pub., Jefferson NC, 1983, p. 191.

The conclusion of this section is that critical art can be politically most effective in various ways both within the institutional settings and outside of them as long as the artists’ critical attitude is not dictated by what cultural hegemony wants them to be critical of. ‘Outsider’ art (also called (more or less accurately) ‘art brut’, ‘raw art’, ‘informal art’, ‘amateur art’, ‘folk art’, ‘naïve art’, ‘self-taught art’, ‘visionary art’ or, in an expression which seems to be seldom used today, ‘primitive art’) often carry some political connotations emphasizing an alternative culture of resistance. ‘Outsider’ art operates, according to Alain Badiou²⁷⁷, in terms of “a different durée to that imposed by the law of the world”, displacing hierarchies and cultural norms. ‘Outsider’ art is not ‘another’ artistic genre (or artistic technique) but an untapped resource of economical, social, political and historical data.

²⁷⁴ This is part of a larger argument I have developed in my paper “A Theoretical Excursus on the Concept of Political Art in Communism and its Aftermath”, in Studia Politica. Romanian Political Science Review, vol. XI, no. 4, Bucharest, 2011, pp. 647-660.

²⁷⁵ According to Howard Becker, “70% of the visitors to a typical contemporary art gallery have a professional interest in art”. Howard Becker, Art Worlds, University of California Press, Berkeley, Los Angeles, 1982, p. 106.

²⁷⁶ Gregory Sholette, Dark Matter: Art and Politics in the Age of Enterprise Culture, Pluto Press, London, 2011, p. 44.

²⁷⁷ Alain Badiou, “The Communist Hypothesis”, New Left Review, 49, 2008, p. 41.

5.4. To Whom Must Political-Critical Art be Addressed in Order for it to be Most Effective?

Even if political-critical art is exhibited /performed in the public space, we still have to ask: to whom must critical art be addressed in order for it to be effective? As I have already stated, political-critical art's main purpose is to awake the awareness of the viewer making her/him "conscious of the mechanisms of oppression and domination".²⁷⁸ If that art manages to stir up the spectator's awareness, then it fulfils its political purpose successfully. But, as I have argued, political-critical art cannot effectively accomplish this goal if it functions within a privileged, autonomous aesthetic realm only. Then, the politically concerned artist usually uses the anti-aesthetic strategies hoping to produce an art which criticize and mocks the art of "pure forms", art appreciated in the mainstream art institutions or in the mainstream Aesthetics and Art Journals.

The kind of aesthetic experience expected from the public is not the kind of experience which is valuable in its own right (autonomous experience) but comingled with some other expectancy. The goal of some political-critical artists has been to produce an art piece which is not a matter of prestige but rather it is a thing in the world (which is undifferentiated from other things-common things). Many contemporary critical artists just pick up garbage from the street, offer food to the poor or offer English courses for irregular immigrants.²⁷⁹ All these artistic-political actions seem indistinguishable from similar quotidian activities. Their purpose is obviously to bring the idea of injustice to the spectator but the question is then: why these actions performed by political artists would bring the idea of injustice to us in a way that other quotidian feedings of the poor and helping the immigrant cannot. Obviously, we appreciate the idea of these art projects and the “caring” altogether, if we are trained to understand them as such.

²⁷⁸ Jaques Ranciere, "Disensus: On Politics and Aesthetics", London & New York: Continuum, 2010.

²⁷⁹ For instance, political artist Tania Bruguera initiated an art project called "Immigrant Movement International 2010-2015" in which she basically lives on the minimum wage in a shared flat with illegal immigrants in Corona, Queens (NY), gives lessons for free in English for them, helps them with legal assistance and so on (source: <http://www.tate.org.uk/whats-on/tate-modern/tanks-tate-modern/exhibition/tania-bruguera-immigrant-movement-international>, last accessed 7 August 2013).

The indistinguishableness of these artistic actions from regular actions is a political-critical strategy only for those trained to identify it as such and to consider it an anti-aesthetic establishment strategy. In reality, this indistinguishableness makes these kinds of works unreadable as art by any public other than that trained in complex contemporary aesthetics or art theory. Then, the answer for the question “for whom is political-critical art effective” is, unfortunately: for those who share the artistic “vocabulary” or the “cultural code”. In other words, some critical art instances (apart of how much anti-aesthetic and anti-elitist is their strategy intended to be) remain inaccessible to non-specialist viewer. Perhaps, in some cases, the political stance of the piece is comprehensible and transparent for the viewer but this apprehending could be realized in front of any other product from mass communication, not necessarily artistic. Nevertheless, there are pieces of political – critical art reasonably accessible to a general public, while revealing “further complexities to those able to set it conceptually within its art world context”,²⁸⁰.

“Criticality” can take many forms (among which the highly abstract ones). As Martha Rosler points out, “criticality that manifests as a subtle thread in iconographic details is unlikely to be apprehended by wide audiences across national borders. The veiled criticality of art under repressive regimes generally manifesting as allegory or symbolism, needs no explanation for those who shared that repression, but audiences outside that policed universe will need a study guide. In either case, it is not the general audience but the educated castes and professional artists or writers who are most attuned to such hermeneutics”.²⁸¹

²⁸⁰ Paul Mattick talks about Barbara Kruger’s work which is both accessible for the general public thanks to its use of imagery and verbal forms borrowed from mass communication and, aesthetically sophisticated for the specialists (Paul Mattick, “Aesthetics and Anti-Aesthetics in the Visual Arts”, in The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Spring, 1993, p. 256).

Yet, on the other hand, there are many examples of critical art which don't belong to established and mainstream artworlds and don't need the vocabulary and the specialized knowledge of the mainstream art theories to do their job effectively. For instance, very little has been written and researched about the political import of decorative artifacts. Folk arts are typically isolated in the area of the 'ornamental'; they are seldom seen as 'political' or 'critical'. By the same token, the artifacts of political expression are not seen as belonging to a tradition of art-making. The decorative artifacts I am concerned with here are 'outsider art' which deal both with beauty and politics or social change. Their producers are artisans with little or no exposure to art media. They have no professional interest in arts; they don't call themselves 'artists' and have no idea of art institutions, aesthetic theories or alternative art worlds. However, even if their products are not typically called 'art', this does not mean that these forms of artistic creativity from outside the mainstream art institutions cannot act critically and progressively. In some cases, the handmade decorative pieces are not just 'freely beautiful' artifacts but functional beauties which take part in a culture of resistance.

These decorative objects are rather cheerful and raw than sublime and elaborate pieces, but this does not mean that they don't perform effectively their political function for the people from that community (the community in which they have been produced). Not only the biggest biennales or museums of contemporary art exhibit pieces which are politically concerned and engaged but also the peasant's kitchens from the remote corners of the world. We can look for political involvement in unexpected places, like in hand-made ornament or decoration from peasant's houses. For instance, in the rural areas from Eastern and Central Europe, women used to decorate their kitchens with handmade wall hangings through which they attempt to express their feelings and daily concerns.

²⁸¹ Martha Rosler, "Take the Money and Run? Can Political and Socio-critical Art 'Survive'?", in E-flux, 2011 <http://www.e-flux.com/journal/take-the-money-and-run-can-political-and-socio-critical-art> (last accessed 7 August 2013).

Many of these decorations repeat animalistic, vegetative or geometric patterns and cheerful messages, such as: ‘Who is clean and tidy makes a palace out of a hut’; ‘It is easier to eat than to cook’. Besides these merry messages there are also critical ones like: ‘I love my pipe when I have tobacco, and the wife when she is baking a turkey’; ‘I married you to clean your house’ or ‘My oh my, it wouldn’t hurt if it got better’. The messages inscribed in fabric are cheerful and distressing; humorous and sad; silly and thoughtful. Many art connoisseurs find them grotesque, kitschy or heartbreakingly touching because they are often associated with triviality, domesticity or ‘popular culture’. There is also a tendency to consider them as a raw form of artistry (a childish and naïve one) which has to do more with a dumb beauty than with ‘art’, politics or social justice. But the issue I want to address here is not to decide whether an activity associated with ‘work of craft’ can be called art. Many times it can be, but I will not go into this debate here. My aim is a different one: to argue that some hand-made decorative artifacts, which could be labelled as ‘art brut’, perform a critical-political function effectively.²⁸² All these examples of homemade political critique illustrate how an inoffensive activity and its end-products can bring about changes at social or personal level, even for those who never thought about it that way.

A piece of homemade decoration can be politically effective if it empowers the maker or if it rekindles the viewer’s sensibility when issues of injustice are at stake. Perhaps for many crafting is not revolutionary (in the sense that a wall hanging decoration will never stop a war or make a politician resign). But not always a critical engagement attempts to achieve or means that. As Hans Aarsman rightly suggests, what we need: “is a template model for what critical engagement should try to achieve in our day and age: forget the ‘winners’ and ‘losers’ and provide examples of people who operate in a different force field. People, who are not grasping, not filled with self-importance and not embittered, people with a profound understanding of who they are and what they stand for”.²⁸³

²⁸² “Art brut” is a term coined by Jean Dubuffet in the mid of 1940s, which has come to signify the outsider art (folk, naïve, visionary).

Anonymous, predominantly women, undertake these works of craft both for politics and pleasure. They are not animated by the same ideals as craftivist contemporary artists.²⁸⁴ These “innocent” decorative pieces are not seeking to react as an alternative to the blindly buying consumer goods. There is another ideology at stake: to empower the maker. So, these pieces of hand-made political art are effective by empowering the producer. Still, the conclusion is not that political-critical art must be addressed only to the “excluded” or “outsider” publics (which exist alongside with the official, conventional art world). As the art collective H-arta posits: “Thinking about the social concerns of our projects, we are not interested in ‘saving’ the ones who are marginal and excluded in a paternalistic, hypocritical way by projecting the problems that need to be solved elsewhere, in the realm of the exotic ‘other’. We wanted to address our art both to those marginalized – in the hope that it will become an instrument of analysis and change – but also to those in the majority, who need to become aware of their own privileged situation, whether we talk about the privilege of being ‘white’, male, of higher class, etc. Examining our own inherent hierarchies and manifestations of hidden racism, thinking about the ways in which we all contribute to a society which marginalizes and exploits large categories of people, are the first steps for acting in solidarity with the ones that are excluded”.²⁸⁵

²⁸³ Hans Aarsman, “Do we just keep complaining about injustice or do we set an example?”, in Aaron Betsky, New Commitment in Architecture, Art and Design, New York: Hans NAI Publishers, 2004, pp. 27-32.

²⁸⁴ In the last ten years, an art movement called ‘Craftivism’ emerged as a reaction to neo-liberal hegemony, women’s rights repression and other social troubles. The term ‘craftivism’ was coined in order to unite two separated spheres: crafts and activism. For the adepts of this movement, knitting or sewing in public space is an activist gesture meant to suggest that we have to produce our own goods and to try to avoid blindly buying consumer goods.

²⁸⁵ H-arta statement can be consulted at http://on-curating.org/documents/oncurating_issue_1813_large.pdf (last accessed 7 August 2013).

5.5. The Importance of the Means of Production and Distribution for Political-Critical

Art's Effectiveness²⁸⁶

The politics of a piece of art is in a way grasped if the piece is a painting hanging in a museum, and in a different way if the piece is a photograph or a video available on the internet. The medium in which an artwork is presented and distributed is also important for political art's effectiveness. These factors make a piece of art what it is and influence the spectator's aesthetic and political response.

For instance, for Walter Benjamin, not only the context matters (both spatial and temporal) in art's apprehending but also the way in which art is produced and disseminated. He would contend that the means of productions (mechanical reproduction) determines the "politics of reception": "The gradual preference of technical media by the mass public signifies for Benjamin a radical shift in arts to the political".²⁸⁷ This is so because with the advent of mechanical reproducibility the art pieces are no longer seen as aesthetic objects (and the spectator's attention will not be focused anymore on the formal properties but on content and on the way this content is disseminated). In "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction", Benjamin details his "anti-aesthetic" understanding of the aesthetic. He distinguishes what he considers the values of art (mechanical reproduction, politics) from traditional aesthetic values (those of "creativity and genius", eternal value and mystery). Technological reproducibility is one of his new aesthetic categories which confronts the traditional aesthetic values of uniqueness and genius (what he calls "aura").

²⁸⁶ A slightly different version of this section I have detailed in my article "Walter Benjamin's Legacy: the Commonplace as Art and the Question of Authenticity", Heathwood Institute and Press, Holt Norflok, July, 2013.

²⁸⁷ The European Graduate School <http://www.egs.edu/library/walter-benjamin/biography/> (last accessed 27 May 2013)

What is “aura”? Benjamin quite explicitly equates it with what he describes as “the unique phenomenon of distance however close it may be”.²⁸⁸ I understand this assertion in the following way: even if a viewer in a museum is relatively close (physically) to a painting, this does not mean that any distance between him and painting is vanished. Still there is an authoritarian distance between him/her and painting. This distance has to be understood not only in spatial terms but also in temporal ones. Moreover, in museums, on (or beneath) the original paintings of the great masters of art history is usually written “don’t touch the painting!” This “don’t touch!” could be understood literally but also symbolically: the “aura” of the painting is its “unique appearance”. This “unique appearance” should be preserved as it is. Besides the literal meaning, we could understand the imperative “don’t touch the painting!” as another imperative - “don’t try to make it approachable!” The cult value of that painting rests in the fact that it transports the viewer into a distant and unfamiliar province. As Benjamin pointed out, the presence of the original is the “prerequisite of the concept of authenticity”.²⁸⁹ Anyway, for him it is more important to make many reproductions of the original than to aesthetically celebrate the original. The unique existence of an object (or its authenticity) establishes an authoritarian rule. That’s why a plurality of copies would substitute the tyranny of the unique: “to ask for the “authentic” print makes no sense”. This is the beginning of what Benjamin calls “the decay of the aura”.

Photography and film are privileged mediums for Benjamin. There is a piece of textual evidence in which Benjamin claims, in fact, that the representation of reality by film is “incomparably more significant” than that of the painter. This observation occurs in text when he discusses the double comparison between painter and cameraman and between magician and surgeon. The painter is considered by Benjamin a sort of Magician because he “cures” the ²⁸⁸ Benjamin, W „The Work of Art in the Age of its Technological Reproducibility” (Second Version) in Jennings, Michael (Ed.), Walter Benjamin: selected writings, Belknap Press: Mass., 2002, p.255.

²⁸⁹ Walter Benjamin, “The Work of Art in The Age of its Technical Reproducibility”, in “Art and its Significance”, Stephen David Ross (ed.), State University of New York Press, 1994, p. 526.

sick person “by the laying on of hands”. In this practice Benjamin sees a sign of authority especially because the painter like a magician maintains a distance between himself and reality. On the other hand, the cameraman like the surgeon penetrates into the sick body (or reality).

Benjamin thinks that one is entitled to ask from a work of art a meticulous penetration of reality which is achieved by cameraman but it is not achieved by painter. He claims: “there is a tremendous difference between the pictures they obtain. That of a painter is a total one while that of the cameraman consists of multiple fragments which are assembled under a new law”.²⁹⁰ This “new law” suggests that art ceased to be art as it was known before.

What is changed in this new law of art? On the one hand, the context of reception is changed. On the other hand, with the advent of mechanical reproduction we assist to a sort of promotion of the anonymous (both in terms of the subject-matter and authorship). The receptive apparatus of the public is no longer disguised in a contemplative attitude and obedience. This perceptual habit (contemplative) is vanished because the art object is no longer a unique and “auratic” one. Benjamin seems to totally neglect an artist’s presence. For him the presence of an artist is a sign of authorship/authority. The artist is never a creator but a builder. Since life belongs to the sphere of creation and art to that of formation we can understand why Benjamin rejects the idea of “the artist as creator”. His anger is directed against the ideas of genius, the artist as creator and the tradition of cult art.

But let’s go back now to the question of effectiveness. Benjamin has hoped that the mechanical reproduction will bring into being a critically and politically engaged viewer and in this way art would become politically effective. He tried to replace “the cult value of art” with “the exhibition value” (art is accessible to everyone). Yet, I think that this replacement by the means of mechanical reproduction makes art more manageable, more approachable and more visible for the masses but it does not necessarily turn the viewer into a politically and socially aware agent. What the advent of mechanical reproduction obviously does is to prove that art's appreciation cannot be radically separated from the appreciation of its social and cultural context of production. Once we accept these non-perceptual factors as artistically relevant, we no longer value "auratic" art only.

²⁹⁰ Idem, p. 534.

The exhibition value of political art is clearly more easily and democratically distributed by the means of mechanical reproduction but I am not sure whether these means of production trigger the politics of reception too (at least not the politics oppositional to the status quo). It is worth noticing that, on the contrary, these means of production gave rise to the "cult of star and a new aura of originality perfectly suited to the capitalist enterprise".²⁹¹ Yet, the means of production support nevertheless, an anti-auratic mode of aesthetic appreciation which could be called to some extent "political" or "political response", but this is not the whole story. This politics ought to be counter-hegemonic to the interests of the dominant institutions; otherwise art will be just swallowed up by the technological apparatus of those in power. The technological way in which an art piece is produced and distributed is a double edged sword: on the one hand it could be an important factor in the post-auratic aesthetic reception (through the politicization of both production and reception of art) but, on the other hand, the same means of production could function as a tool in the hands of the status quo. In the second version the result is very close to a merely propagandistic function which is not the goal of political-critical art. By the means of mechanical reproduction art could support the rise of Hollywood-type stars, political V.I.P's, corporatist leaders and many other "celebrities" of the capitalist enterprise known as "culture industry". Nobody can deny the existence of a culture industry media which it proves to be “an institutional structure for subjugating the individual to the control of capital” (Raunig, 2011).²⁹²

²⁹¹ Marian Eide, "The Politics of Form: A Response to Jeffrey T. Schnapp", in South Central Review, Vol. 21, No. 1, Spring 2004, p. 53.

Not only what the art piece communicates can be political but also how it says and how it disseminates what it says. Forms, by which some art works become political and critical, require autonomous production and distribution. Both the political and the aesthetic dimension of the art piece depend of this autonomy. Inasmuch as art can have a critical role in society, it cannot just be part of the power apparatus (being produced within the institutions of power and distributed through the channels of that power). Then, human misery will become an object of consumption as any other consumer good. It seems that political artists (as cultural producers) are prisoners as employee(s) of the institution(s) of culture industry.²⁹³

Still, not all means of production and distribution are in danger to be swallowed by the political, economic or cultural status quo. There are still zines²⁹⁴ or independent art publications (like “The Independent Media Center of Philadelphia” which used to edit an independent “Aesthetic Journal”) which sustain an autonomously critical art production and distribution. Political artists and activists still hope to make them visible without using the mainstream art media. Producing critical art entails an interrogation of its entire mode of organization: from form and content relationship as tactics of articulating meaning to modes of production and dissemination, ownership of cultural product, its hierarchy of labour as well as the type of relationship between the artist and those who are represented (workers, ethnic minorities, economically challenged people). Critical art acts politically mostly when it is produced as a genuinely collaborative piece. A genuinely collaborative piece is an intersubjective type of collaboration in which the artist is not the one who directs and dictates the action and the message of those who perform. The others (the public) have to be involved in a dialog, giving them a voice of their own and not speaking for them or using them to communicate artist's "political" message. Yet, it is not enough to want to transform spectators (passive consumers) in art producers by bringing technological means to the people if the final piece of art is owned and distributed through certain channels of the hegemonic institutions.

²⁹² Gerald Raunig, “Creative Industries as Mass Deception”, in Gerald Raunig, Gene Ray & Ulf Wuggenig (eds.), Critique of Creativity, Precarity, Subjectivity and Resistance in the Creative Industries, MayFly Books, 2011, p. 198.

²⁹³ Idem, p.194.

²⁹⁴ A zine is an original, a small-circulation, self-published newsletters.

5.6. Social Movements and Critical-Political Art²⁹⁵

This section attempts to answer two questions addressed by philosopher Gerald Raunig: (1) "Is there any overlapping between political-critical art and social and political change?", and (2) "How can art promote and animate revolutionary contents?"²⁹⁶

For decades, political art was labeled as "unappealing", "didactic", "boring" or "ideological". "Is this really art?" question has been addressed quite often in the last two decades (Cynthia Freeland's book "But is it art?" is just an example).²⁹⁷ There is also a tendency to appreciate critical art exclusively on political grounds, disregarding any considerations about artistic identity. However, certain concerns regarding the artistic identity and merit do not deemphasize the politics of a piece. Art can have a revolutionary potential in terms of insurrection and resistance to hegemony but this does not mean that artistic practice and political action are one and the same (or that they are not separable on any grounds). Hence, my claim is that political-critical art can be effective qua art and sometimes it can ²⁹⁵ A social movement is "a network of informal interactions between a plurality of individuals, groups or associations, engaged in a political or cultural conflict, on the basis of a shared collective identity" (Diani and Bison, "Organizations, Coalitions and Movements", Theory and Society, 3, 2004, pp. 281-309).

²⁹⁶ Gerald Raunig, 'Art and Revolution: Transversal Activism the Long Twentieth Century', Semiotext(e), 2007 (originally published in Austria by Turia + Kant, 2005).

²⁹⁷ Cynthia Freeland, But Is It Art? An Introduction to Art Theory, Oxford University Press, 2001.

have a revolutionary potential qua art. As Herbert Marcuse would say “I see the political potential of art in art itself”²⁹⁸

This raises the question of what the boundaries are through which something becomes art. This question is unavoidable for the kind of argument I intend to put forth in this study. As I have already mentioned in the first chapter, the 20th century developed the new relativist paradigm “everything is political / everything is art” – with the element added by Beuys, “everyone is an artist”.²⁹⁹ Yet, there should be some limits delimitating art from life and art from non-art, otherwise we end up with sterile formula like “anything is art” (the reasons why these formula are sterile are discussed at large in the first chapter). To regard anything as art takes the force out of the things that are art. To claim that “everything is art” and “everyone is an artist” without further articulation, is as ineffectual as claiming that “everything is interpretation” or “all art is political”. Nevertheless, all art is in a very general sense “political” if we understand “politics” as an imaginative exploration of ideas which are communicated in a medium, but not all art is political in its more robust, confrontational sense. Some art pieces simply don’t express the antagonistic politics I’m emphasizing in this thesis. Thus, it is politically pernicious to see all art as political because it takes the force out of those art situations that clearly are political.³⁰⁰ Going back to the question of what delimitates art from life we have at our disposal at least two important philosophical positions: the “institutional” and the “aesthetic” theory of art. The first one is not an appropriate theory for demarcating art from anything else because “the art institutions” (or the “art world” in George Dickie’s understanding) are just the bureaucratic confinements of art production, reception and distribution. In this way, any despotic political regime could decree

²⁹⁸ Herbert Marcuse, The Aesthetic Dimension, Beacon Press, 1979.

²⁹⁹ Daniel Van Der Gucht, “Pour en finir avec la mythologie de l’artiste politique: de l’engagement a la responsabilite” in Eric Van Essche (ed.), Les Formes Contemporaines d’Art Engage, Collection Essais, Bruxelles, 2007, pp.59-68.

³⁰⁰ See Noël Carroll interview with Ray Privett and James Kreul in Senses of Cinema, <http://www.sensesofcinema.com/2001/13/carroll/> (last accessed 30 October 2011).

what is art and what is whatever else just on the basis of its art institutions of power. Institutionalism is not really an alternative to the aesthetic theory of art.

On the other hand, the aesthetic theory of art, in the traditional and modernist narrow understanding of it, confines the status of art just to those productions which exhibit aesthetic features perceivable by the means of the five senses. Beside this strong sensualistic component, the favourite concepts of traditionalist and conservative aesthetics are terms like: “quality”, “genius”, “disinterested pleasure” or “aesthetic autonomy”. It is impossible to say what these terms connote for us because their use by those in power (hegemonic art institutions) changed their meaning in a way that influences our current apprehending of them.

However, the fact that the established aesthetic theory of art is not workable does not mean that other understandings of aesthetics don’t help in delimitating art from whatever else. Even if, in contemporary art we witness a proliferation of so many objects and situations that could become art pieces (i.e. conceptual art), this does not mean that art and life are inseparable. It is also significant to spell out the idea that not every kind of thing or event can become art. The idea that art is life has been the core of the avant-garde. Many artists call their daily activities “art” on this ground: “For me, all daily tasks, like washing clothes, preparing a meal, shopping, or working in construction are performances, art, acts of survival”.³⁰¹ Yet, if we want to make sense to what extent critical art can be effective and can have a revolutionary potential, we should firstly clearly highlight the relationship between art and life. This controversial relationship has at least two grand narratives: the formalist credo in art which has its own peculiar life and the neo-avant-garde blending of art with life (in which art production and political action are viewed as one and the same thing). A recent philosophical position comes to offer an in-between solution.

³⁰¹ Ion Grigorescu, ‘A Version of Memory (January 2007)’, translated into English by Alex Moldovan, IDEA arts + society, 25, Cluj, 2006, p. 40.

Contrary to models of wholly confusing art and life, the philosopher Gerald Raunig proposes the concept of “concatenation of art and revolution”.³⁰² A concatenation is a temporary overlap of critical activist art and revolution which does not count as a total blending of the two. There are different ways in which the concept of “revolution” is understood and theorized. For Raunig, “revolution” is not ‘one dimensional endeavour to take over the state apparatus’ but it rather comes to mean an interconnected “insurrection, resistance and constituent power” (I suppose that he refers to power to affect outcomes or to achieve specific goals and not to power over, in the sense of domination). Art can have a revolutionary potential in terms of insurrection and resistance but this does not mean that artistic practice and political action are one and the same. Political action and art practice become linked activities for Raunig, which overlap for a limited period of time, without turning out in indistinguishable entities. This temporal and limited concatenation of art and revolution in which the two parts still remain open up from both sides, effectively eludes some habitual troubles.

Firstly, it circumvents the confusion with both Nazi’s aesthetical mass organization (aesthetization of politics)³⁰³ and Communist endeavours to integrate and homogenize the masses using art. Raunig offers a detailed account of the way in which totalitarianism attempted to integrate the masses by the means of art: “This kind of integrative conjunction of masses and art does not engender assemblages of singularities, nor organizational concatenations seeking to change production circumstances. Instead it deletes differences, territorializes, segments and striates space, achieving a uniformity of the masses through the means of art”.³⁰⁴ Walter Benjamin and Richard Wagner (among others) have signalled the ³⁰² Gerald Raunig, “Art and Revolution: Transversal Activism the Long Twentieth Century”, Semiotex(e), 2007 (originally published in Austria by Turia + Kant, 2005).

³⁰³ Walter Benjamin, “The Work of Art in The Age of its Technical Reproducibility”, in Stephen David Ross (ed.), “Art and its Significance”, State University of New York Press, 1994.

³⁰⁴ Gerald Raunig, “Art and Revolution: Transversal Activism the Long Twentieth Century”, Semiotex(e), 2007 (originally published in Austria by Turia + Kant, 2005).

risks of totalizing art and life.³⁰⁵ Nevertheless, “transitions, overlaps and concatenations of art and revolution”³⁰⁶ (as murky, fragile, negative or fragmentary they may appear) for a limited temporal sequence, without considering art and life indistinguishable, would prevent the homogenization of masses by the means of art.

Secondly, the momentarily concatenation of art and revolution in political-critical art, persecuted as it is by the mainstream art-world, effectively overcomes the traditional aesthetics’ dichotomy between autotelic art and art that is politically concerned. The temporary overlapping between art and revolution, which in a certain way still preserves the autonomy of both of them but it also allow them to work soundly together, opens the road for re-considering the traditional aesthetic categories and canons.³⁰⁷ Since we no longer speak about absolute field demarcations and art can overlap with politics and revolution without losing its relative separateness, we cannot be completely wrong if we attempt to re-tool the rigid and conventional cannons imposed by established aesthetic theories of art. The relation between “art” and “revolution” is not a slippery one and there is no need to be concerned that one would deemphasize or annihilate the other.

For some contemporary art theorists it does not even matter if activist, critical art is art or not if it fulfils successfully its critical purpose. The neglect of the artistic dimension of activist artworks seems to me as pernicious as the separation of art from politics on purely aesthetic grounds. Raunig’s concatenation proposal re-conceptualizes the relationship between art and politics. In this understanding art and politics operate soundly together without being a total synthesis. Art is not just an instrument of politics and politics is not just art's content and, more importantly, art effectively can promote and animate revolutionary contents qua art.

³⁰⁵ For instance, Benjamin believed that the all efforts to render politics aesthetically culminate in tragedy and wars. Source: <http://www.marxists.org/reference/subject/philosophy/works/ge/benjamin.htm> (last accessed 7 August 2013)

³⁰⁶ Gerald Raunig, Introduction: The Concatenation of Art and Revolution. <http://semiotexte.com/?p=127> (last accessed 3 August 2013).

³⁰⁷ In art’s case “autonomy” is just a relative autonomy. Excepting the case of formalist art where art can itself be treated as an autonomous “life of forms”, any other case art is art as something else (so the autonomy is just a relative one). Even when art is abandoned for “real life” it is still partly autonomous. Even in the cases when the art production as part of culture industry has only a relative autonomy, there is still something to be done about this autonomy (as fragile as it is).

To take a concrete and recent example of the way in which art and social movements overlap effectively (Raunig's "art promoting and animating revolutionary contents"), I will discuss in what follows the significance of critical art in Occupy Wall Street Movement (OWS). This social movement is part of the international protest against economic inequality. OWS was the first occupy movement to receive wide coverage (it started on 17 September 2011 in Zuccotti Park, New York City). The well-known slogan of this movement was "We are the 99%", referring to the concentration of wealth among the top 1% of income earners compared to the other 99 percent.³⁰⁸ There has been a lot of art centered on the OWS: street posters, logos (the famous 99% logo and many others), embroideries and other handmade crafts, graffiti, poetry readings, film, music, collages, carnivalesque performances, guerrilla theatre and so on.

Besides these artistic actions there has been also a series of protests directed against art's corporatization and commodification. A group known as "Occupy Museums" demonstrated at MOMA against corporate and economic interests dictating what art is successful and desirable. They describe themselves as follows: "Occupy Museums is an action group within OWS movement that seeks to reoccupy our art galleries, museums and cultural institutions with the needs, values, histories and art of the 99%". Another group 'No-Comment' organized an ad-hoc exhibition with art inspired by the moment.

OWS was not just a local protest movement in which art played its important role. Artists globally designed street posters and logos "to collectively construct the aesthetic appeal of the moment".³⁰⁹ Critical Art within OWS transmitted the message of the movement with wit and with beauty, but it also did more than that through making the creative energy of ³⁰⁸ Wall Street Protests Spread, CBS News, source: http://www.cbsnews.com/2300-201_162-10009481.html (last accessed 7 August 2013).

³⁰⁹ The significance of Art in Occupy Movement: <http://vimeo.com/39412878>.

the 99% percent visible (art occupied art in the sense that not only streets and museums has been occupied but also the so-called “professionalized art”). Moreover, art’s effectiveness in OWS movement does not necessarily rest in transmitting the message of this protest (even if it did that too) but in making people understand their own place in this Occupying Movement (and making them see how they relate to each other).

Still, the important point I have to make is that critical art of the Occupy Movement, indeed, overlaps with the protest movement but this does not mean that it does not preserve its own independence (and art-hood). Political artists of the OWS movement don’t want their art to be invisible as art (even if they meant it as protesting economic inequalities). Then “How could political art retain its identity as art if many times it simultaneously produces a critique of art?” (“Occupy Art” and “Occupy Museums” are just two examples of critical art movements within OWS protest). The answer to this question is not ready to hand and until this moment I don’t have a definitive answer on this issue.

5.7. Conclusions

In this last chapter, I have attempted to answer several interrelated questions; each of which having to do with the issue of “effectiveness” in political-critical art’s case. Many tend to disagree both on which kinds of art pieces are politically effective and on what does “politically effective” actually mean. It seems that being politically effective means more than one thing. The question of ‘effectiveness’ in political-critical art’s case is addressed from many perspectives. To be politically effective does not only mean “to defeat hegemony” but also to re-kindle emotion or to acknowledge the mechanisms of domination.

Political engagement can take place in different force fields: not only in the mainstream institutions and in the streets but also in the remote zones of our sensibility. Not only transgressive, shocking and violent critical art can be effective but also campy, sentimental and handmade ornamental artifacts. Even if one may find the latter “melodramatic” or “soapy” at the first glance, it does not follow that criticism and social change find expression only within radical forms of activism. This simply means at least two things: firstly, that critical engagement manifests in many (and sometimes antagonistic) art forms (from radical art³¹⁰ to handmade decoration and “soapy” music); and secondly, that political-critical art can be effective in unexpected ways. Not only art that combines activism and social organizing can be effective³¹¹ but also some “inoffensive” art productions, which seem completely powerless at a first glance (like ornaments, art brut or folk arts).

Works of political art are not necessarily effective if they shake society loudly and aggressively. Shock art and radical art might do more harm in certain social ills than help to overcome a difficult state of affairs because it occasions a reaction of pain, frustration and weakness in spectators (which does nothing more than to turn into stones spectators in their position). Sometimes, political art is more effective if it re-kindles our heart. The impact conducting to political change takes place at personal level. Political-critical art can be effective even if it changes the way of thinking and acting at the individual level only. The society’s “mind” cannot be changed unless its individuals change their minds or are provoked to empathize. This “provocation” can be shocking and aggressive but also smooth and compassionate.

³¹⁰ Radical art can be described as an offensive, disobedient and outrageous art. An example of radical art is art produced by the Russian group Voyna. They performed many offensive artistic actions like “Humiliation of the cop in his own house” (the artists entered a police station in Moscow and hung one of Medvedev’s portraits on the prison bars); “A cop in a priest’s robe” (Voyna’s activist Oleg Votnikov entered a supermarket wearing a priest’s robe and the hat of a police officer. He left without paying some beverages, to demonstrate the invulnerability of church and police; “Giant galactic space penis” (in just 23 seconds, Voyna painted a 213 feet-tall phallus on a historic bridge as a reaction against Russian Federal agencies).

³¹¹ An example of effective art which combines activism and social organizing is Laurie Jo Reynolds’s “legislative art”. Her artistic project managed to reform an Abu Ghraib like prison from Illinois (US). Laurie Jo Reynolds declares that the art project included a huge campaign of public education in which fine arts events, panel discussions and press conferences have been combined to an effective end.

Even the innermost lyrical art production can act politically and critically if it is connected with our everyday involvement in disturbing situations which take place in the world. Critical art is politically effective when “breaks into the soul” through the “aesthetic appreciation”. As Lukacs would say, it seems as if man is not directly prompted into action (to change something here and now), but that only his readiness “to make certain decisions undergoes a change. It is therefore equally wrong to deny that art has any influence upon social life at all, as it is to affirm that art has the power to effectuate decisive changes. After hearing a concerto grosso, for instance, there is no immediate, concrete effect upon action but only a greater readiness... The social role of art, as the ancient Greek knew, is very important, indeed, but it is basically the role of ‘preparing the soul’”.³¹² Then, we can say that art “may stop a war” (indirectly) or “change the world” because it is in art’s power to foster empathy and compassion or awareness and deliberation. Political art can do what art in general can do qua art. What differentiates political-critical art from apolitical art is that the former intends to be politically effective. Even apolitical art may be politically effective sometimes, but this is not its deliberate purpose. In the case of political-critical art, this is one of its main aims. Yet, in order to stir up action, awareness or dissent, critical-political art has to be appreciated as art in the first place. In sum, political effectiveness of art does not reside in transmitting political messages³¹³ but in how that messages are transmitted.

³¹² Georg Lukacs, in Vera Maslow, “Lukacs’ Man-Centered Aesthetics”, Philosophy and Phenomenological Research, Vol. 27, No. 4, 1967, p. 546.

³¹³ Jacques Rancière, Le spectateur émancipé, Paris: Le Fabrique, 2008, p. 61.

CONCLUSIONS

The aim of this dissertation was to propose an enlarged account of the aesthetic (a sufficiently rich understanding of the aesthetic and of aesthetic theory) that accommodates critical-political art. The argument stemmed from the need to counterbalance the recurrent critical discourse, which emphasizes the aesthetic as one of the critical-political art's enemies. In many contemporary critical studies, the aesthetic has become the anathema to socially and politically engaged art. In contemporary philosophy of art, in art theory and in critical studies, there are major disagreements regarding the relationship between art and politics, on the one hand, and political art and the aesthetic, on the other. The main purpose of this dissertation was to take issue with those views, which mistakenly claim that the aesthetic and critical engagements cannot co-exist. To this end, this dissertation attempted to critically evaluate two opposite theoretical camps, which claim that there is a gap between the aesthetic and critical art:

The first category of detractors of the co-existence of the aesthetic and political-critical art regards contemporary critical art as dominated by ethical, political, and social concerns to the detriment of aesthetic concerns. This theoretic camp is represented by traditional/conservative aestheticians, “modernist” art critics and “old school” art historians. Political-critical art is a confrontational art, dealing with problems of injustice or abuses of power. Its purpose is to increase the awareness about the mechanisms of domination in society by criticizing those mechanisms. On the other hand, the aesthetic has been customarily understood as something affording a pleasurable experience (of a special kind), which happens to us when we perceive the surface / form of art works or natural kinds. Political art, these critics claim, does not operate primarily via the aesthetic: it is not a pleasing art because its purpose is not to afford us an aesthetic experience, but to make us conscious of society's problems.

The second category of detractors holds that there is a gap between political-critical art and the aesthetic, but for different reasons than those sketched above. This theoretical position holds that the aesthetic is an “ideological construct” (Terry Eagleton, Paul de Man, and Pierre Bourdieu among many others) or an instrument of “evasion” (Raymond Williams), which usually supports and popularizes the values of the status quo (cultural elites). By the same token, as Steiner argues, “there is a fundamental mistrust in aesthetic objects and aesthetics, in individual expression and in documenting non-artistic reality without interfering in its course. Instead political art is favoured (according to Igor Stokfiszewsk, “a member of the Polish community Krytyka Polityczna,” quoted by Barbara Steiner) because it “acknowledges the superior status of life’s praxis over aesthetics and the superiority of that which is collective over that which is individual, seeing existentialism and spirituality as juxtaposed to the materialism of the system of social and economic organization”.³¹⁴ This theoretical camp posits that political art must be a non-aesthetic art if it attempts to succeed politically or to effect political change (in its most extreme version, this position can be summarized as follows: “it does not even matter if political art is art or not, as long as it fulfils its political purpose”).

Therefore, the first theoretical camp finds political art as detrimental to the aesthetic, while the second camp finds the aesthetic detrimental to the political. Against both categories of critics, this dissertation argued that political-critical art need not be evaluated in accordance with the notion of the aesthetic they are employing. These diatribes directed against aesthetics are sound only if we understand the aesthetic narrowly (as a cognitively uninfected perception, as passive contemplation, as “no interest allowed” in art appreciation, as immediate and disinterested pleasure, and so on). However, this dissertation argues that there is no need to set apart political art and aesthetic concerns only because certain interpretations of the aesthetic (which are unfortunately still influential and largely widespread) are opposing praxis (and politics) to the aesthetic.

³¹⁴ Barbara Steiner, “No Velvet Glove Criticism: Towards a Political Effectiveness of Art”, Fair Observer, source: <http://www.fairobserver.com/article/no-velvet-glove-criticism-towards-political-effectiveness-art> (last accessed 7 August 2013).

This dissertation aimed to clarify what political art is and what the relationship between art, the political and the aesthetic is. To this end, Chapter 1 first conceptually clarified the meaning of political art and the relationship between art and the political. The following chapters attempted to bridge the gap between political art and the aesthetic, in spite of all the discontent regarding their relationship (chapters 2, 3 and 4). Chapter 2 argued for an enlargement of the concept of the aesthetic, thus accommodating extra-perceptual, political and other contemporary arts. The need for an enlarged understanding of the aesthetic according to which non-perceptual properties of art are still aesthetic is explained in detail. This enlargement of the concept of the aesthetic (for example, as envisaged by the contemporary aesthetician James Shelley) accommodates political, conceptual, and radical art. By accepting non-perceptual aesthetic features in art appreciation and experiencing, the gap between political art and the aesthetic can fruitfully be bridged.

Chapters 3 dealt with disinterestedness and Chapter 4 with beauty. The fact that I have chosen to revisit these two concepts is not accidental. I intended to revisit them because both are crucial in traditional aesthetics. As I pointed out, the aestheticians of the last two hundred years have generally relied upon an understanding of the aesthetic that has to do with a disinterestedness thesis. In very general lines, something (an artistic or natural object) is “aesthetic” if it is pleasing in appearance (where the pleasure is immediate and disinterested), and thus affords an aesthetic experience. Furthermore, the topic of “beauty” cannot be excluded from the discussion on the aesthetic because traditionally beauty has been considered the paradigmatic aesthetic quality of art. At different times the aesthetic has been identified with the idea of beautiful (to be aesthetic meant to be beautiful).

Chapter 3 attempted to re-evaluate the concept of disinterestedness by re-considering the 18th century understanding of disinterestedness (Shaftesbury) as opposed to the 20th century's meaning of the term (Stolnitz). I have argued for the great significance of disinterestedness in critical art's appreciation (in spite of many contemporary voices, which claim that political-critical art is that type of art/arts that cannot and should not be apprehended in a disinterested manner). I have argued that political art cannot be experienced in a disinterested manner (as that proposed by Stolnitz or, more recently, by Brand) because to maintain the centrality of a disinterested attention means to sustain the aesthetic attitude which means independence of moral and political judgments.

Although I argue that the kind of disinterestedness, which is suitable for political-critical art's apprehension, is to some extent closer to the 18th century's (to Shaftesbury's) understanding of it, this does not mean that the two are identical. Disinterestedness for Shaftesbury is not the lack or absence of all interests (like for the attitude theorists), but it is opposed to pecuniary, selfish or other morally questionable interests. However, I argued that even this understanding of disinterestedness is not satisfactory for critical art's apprehending because Shaftesbury contrasts the disinterested stance toward an object with using that object for some purpose. He assumes that a disinterested apprehension is that apprehension, which considers the object in its own terms, in a moral way (without selfish, pecuniary and symbolic advantages motivating the apprehension or other ethically questionable interests). At the same time, his disinterestedness is not permeable to the idea of using the object for some ulterior purposes. My standpoint on this is that if a piece of art has an ulterior purpose (as political-critical art certainly has) and we use it to achieve that purpose, this does not mean that our apprehending and our appreciation are no longer disinterested. We do not have to contrast appreciation of art as "means" (interested, instrumental) with appreciation "for its own sake" (disinterested, non-instrumental). Having an ulterior purpose in our appreciation of critical art is still a disinterested appreciation if that purpose (or purposes) is not morally bad, selfish or motivated by immoral desires and purposes. Our interests in apprehending critical-political art pieces are directed toward some values, such as social justice, compassion, rightness, care, and so on. These values are both instrumental and intrinsic values.

Chapter 4 argued that beauty is not at odds with critical art (as it is usually claimed) because beauty is not only that which is pleasant at sight. Typically it is argued that beauty in an aesthetic sense has no function (excepting the pleasure it affords) and our responses to it are immediate responses (we just sense that something is beautiful without asking why that something is beautiful). According to this customary understanding of beauty, political-critical art does not seem to raise in viewers the feeling of aesthetic pleasure, mostly because of its unappealing look. Against this view, I argued that beauty should not be restricted to a certain type of pleasure. In the case of political art, beauty is not easily recognizable because it is a difficult beauty (demanding more than a feeling of pleasure in order to be acknowledged).

Unlike the common understanding of beauty as that which is immediately pleasant to senses, I endorsed an understanding of beauty as a way of experiencing the relationships between what is out there (in the object) and what is in our mind about what is out there. I drew my argument on some neglected aspects from Kant's theory of art (namely, "dependent beauty"). I argued that political-critical art could claim a dependent beauty (an impure, functional, "difficult" and not straightforward pleasurable type of beauty) without being compelled to submit itself, at the same time, to what Kant calls "free beauty". I suggested that beauty was not "useless" and "merely pleasant to look at," but that it could be political and critical through and through. There are many kinds of beauty and it would be a mistake to conceive that there is a single, peculiar quality which all kinds of beauty have in common (like unity, symmetry, simplicity and whatever else aestheticians have pointed out over the years) and that quality occasions in us a peculiar feeling of pleasure.

The last chapter of this dissertation attempted to explain what it means for critical art to be politically effective. The political effectiveness of art does not reside in transmitting political messages but in how those messages are transmitted. I argued that art could be effective politically and it could sometimes have a revolutionary potential qua art. Art can be politically effective in terms of insurrection and resistance to hegemony, but this does not mean that artistic practice and political action are one and the same (or that they are not separable on any grounds). Political action and art practice have different ontologies, but they can become linked activities, which overlap for a limited period of time, without turning out in indistinguishable entities.

There are, nevertheless, many other dimensions of a sufficiently rich understanding of the aesthetic, which have not been approached in this dissertation but they might be the focus of further research on political art and aesthetics. A significant political art practice that has not been discussed in this thesis is artistic collectivism. There is an increasing interest and a congenial attitude towards art collectives even if this format is not very appreciated in the mainstream art world and art market because both of them campaign for the individual, “unique” artist.³¹⁵ Collectivism signifies the politically engaged art which does not stand for a single artist’s voice. In contrast to individualist art production (the myth of the individual artist as a “genius” and a “cultural hero”), collectivism connotes a sense of togetherness, multitude, solidarity, and political-critical engagement, which challenges/changes certain ideas of authorship, ownership, aesthetic object and aesthetic experience.

The emergence of collective art practice prompted new ways of thinking and theorizing about art, both in what regards the significance of its production and the aesthetics of its reception. Collectivist artistic practice promotes a collaborative model of production that joins artists with site-specific communities. This collaboration becomes part of the work's content that literally engages the spectators. All these developments in modern and contemporary collective art practice have triggered a series of important implications and changes for aesthetic theory of art and not a dismissal of the aesthetic at the hands of the "social turn" in art, as many have argued.

³¹⁵ I offered a detailed account of collectivist art production in my forthcoming article “Collectivism”, in Michael Kelly (ed.), Encyclopedia of Aesthetics, New York: Oxford University Press, (2014).

Contemporary collectivist art, with its focus on community-based socially engaged practice, needs a particular theory of aesthetic communication and engagement, which differs from its traditional and modernist counterparts by emphasizing collective engagement rather than the disinterested contemplation and transcendental subject of aesthetic experience. Further research should envisage how exactly a communal aesthetic experience may replace (or enlarge) the prevalent aesthetic experience of the singular beholders (what Grant Kester calls "the conventional aesthetic experience") confronted with an art object or situation. Since collective art production emphasizes a sense of togetherness and communicability occasioned by a communal experience, which takes place on dialogical grounds, we cannot speak anymore of an "aesthetic subject" who experiences art in a de-contextualized manner. Grant Kester offers an important account of communal aesthetic experience, a "dialogical" model of aesthetic experience.³¹⁶

What Kester conceives as the "dialogical" model of aesthetic experience entails: (1) the subject of aesthetic experience as embodied, which is aware of his/her political-economic context and culturally situated (for Kester, the subject has only a "partially determined subjectivity and identity", one that is perpetually co-constituted by interaction and communication with other subjects); (2) interestedness both in the existence (or reality) of the object of the judgment and in the practical sense (the ulterior purpose of the object); and (3) a specific and peculiar understanding of sensus communis as “a sense of the commonness of cognition itself,” which allows empathic identification with other subjects and mutual respect and understanding. In this interpretation, sensus communis does not entail the conditions of possibility for the communicability of feelings in the absence of any conceptual grounds (as in Kant’s aesthetic theory), but it rather refers to ethical (placing oneself in other’s shoes) and conceptual grounds.

³¹⁶ In Grant Kester, Conversation Pieces. Community and Communicability in Modern Art, Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.

However, it is not yet clear if this “placing oneself in other’s shoes” within the dialogical model of aesthetic experience is really achievable to count as a truly communal experience (since in Kester’s view there is no pre-given framework for a mutual understanding of those who collaborate in collective art production), but this might be the focus of a further study.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- AARSMAN, Hans. "Do we just keep complaining about injustice or do we set an example?" in Aaron Betsky (ed.), New Commitment, in Architecture, Art and Design, New York: Hans NAI Publishers, (2004): 27-32.
- ADORNO, Theodor. Aesthetic Theory, London: Athlone, 1997.
- ADORNO, Theodor. "Commitment" in Andrew Arto and Eike Gebhardt (eds.), Essential Frankfurt School Reader, New York: Continuum, 1982, pp. 300-319.
- ARETOULAKIS, Emmanouil. "Aesthetic Appreciation, Ethics, and 9/11" in Contemporary Aesthetics, 3 (2008), available at: <http://www.contempaesthetics.org/newvolume/pages/article.php?articleID=510>.
- ASAVEI, Maria Alina. "A Theoretical Excursus on the Concept of Political Art in Communism and its Aftermath", in The Romanian Political Science Review, Vol. XI, No. 4 (2011): 647-660.
- ASAVEI, Maria Alina. "Functional Beauty and Handmade Political Art", Art & Education, Vol. 10, No. 4 (2012), available at: <http://www.artandeducation.net/paper/functional-beauty-and-handmade-political-art/>.
- ASAVEI, Maria Alina. "Aesthetics of Resistance and Persistence", in Alina Serban (ed.), Ion Grigorescu. The Man with a Single Camera, Berlin: Sternberg Press, 2013
- ASAVEI, Maria Alina. "Walter Benjamin's Legacy: the Commonplace as Art and the Question of Authenticity", Heathwood Institute and Press, July 2013, available at: <http://www.heathwoodpress.com/walter-benjamins-legacy-commonplace-art-question-authenticity/>.
- ASAVEI, Maria Alina. "Collectivism" (forthcoming), in Michael Kelly (ed.), Encyclopedia of Aesthetics, New York: Oxford University Press, 2014.
- BADIOU, Alain. Ethics: An Essay of the Understanding of Evil, translated by Peter Hallward, London: Verso, 2001.
- BADIOU, Alain. "The Communist Hypothesis", New Left Review, 49 (2008): 41.
- BATEMAN, Chris. The Activist's Argument (Everything is Political), available at http://onlyagame.typepad.com/only_a_game/2010/05/the-activists-argument-everything-is-political.html.
- BECKER, Howard. Art Worlds, Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982.
- BENJAMIN, Walter. "The Work of Art in The Age of its Technical Reproducibility", in Stephen David Ross (ed.), Art and its Significance, New York: State University of New York Press, 1994, pp. 526-538.
- BENSON, Peter. "On Beauty and Being Just by Elaine Scarry" in Philosophy Now, available: http://www.philosophynow.org/issue44/On_Beauty_and_Being_Just_by_Elaine_Scarr_y.

- BERLEANT, Arnold. "An Exchange on Disinterestedness" in Contemporary Aesthetics, 1 (2003), available at: <http://www.contempaesthetics.org/newvolume/pages/article.php?articleID=209>.
- BERNSTAIN, John Andrew. "Shaftesbury's Identification of the Good with the Beautiful" in Eighteen Century Studies, Vol. 10, No. 3 (1977): 304-325.
- BISHOP, Bishop, Claire. "The Social Turn: Collaboration and Its Discontents", Artforum International, 44 (2006): 178-183.
- BOURRIAUD, Nicolas, "Relational Aesthetics", Paris: Les Presses du Reel, 1998.
- BRANDY, Emily. "Don't Eat the Daisies: Disinterestedness and Situated Aesthetics" in Environmental Values, 7 (1998): 97-114.
- BUDD, Malcolm. "Aesthetic Essence", in Richard Shusterman and Adele Tomlin (eds.), Aesthetic Experience, New York: Routledge, 2008, pp. 17-31.
- BURKE, Edmund, The Works of Edmund Burke: with a Memoir, New York: George Dearborn Publisher, 2009.
- CARASSCO Barranco, Matilde. "The Dogma of Post-Conceptual Art. The Role of the Aesthetic in the Art of Today", 2012, available at: <http://www.eurosa.org/2012/carrasco.pdf>.
- CARRINGTON Shelton, Andrew. "Art, Politics and the Politics of Art: Ingres's Saint Symphorien at the 1834 Salon" in The Art Bulletin, published by College Art Association, Vol. 83, 4, (2001): pp. 711-740.
- CARROLL, Noël. Beyond Aesthetics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- CARROLL, Noël interview with Ray Privett and James Kreul in Senses of Cinema, available at: <http://www.sensesofcinema.com/2001/13/carroll/>.
- CASHELL, Kieran. "Aftershock: The Ethics of Contemporary Transgressive Art", London-New York: I. B. Tauris & Co Ltd., 2009.
- COHEN, Marshall. "Appearance and the Aesthetic Attitude", Journal of Philosophy, Vol. 56, No. 23 (1959): 915-926.
- COLLISON, Diane. "Aesthetic Experience", in Oswald Hanfling (ed.), Philosophical Aesthetics, Oxford and Cambridge: Blackwell Press, Oxford and Cambridge, 1992.
- COSTELLO, Diarmuid. "Greenberg's Kant and the Fate of Aesthetics in Contemporary Art Theory", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 2 (2007): 217-228.
- COSTELLO, Diarmuid. "Danto and Kant. Together at Last?", in Mark Rollins (ed.), Danto and His Critics, Wiley-Blackwell, 2012, pp.153-171.
- COSTELLO, Diarmuid. "Kant After LeWitt: Toward an Aesthetics of Conceptual Art", in Peter Goldie and Elisabeth Schellekens (eds.), Philosophy and Conceptual Art, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007, pp. 92-115.
- DANTO, Arthur. Unnatural Wonders: Essays from the Gap Between Art and Life, Macmillan, 2005.

- DANTO, Arthur. "Embodied Meanings, Isotypes, and Aesthetical Ideas", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 1 (2007): 121-129.
- DANTO, Arthur. The Transfiguration of the Commonplace, Harvard University Press, 1983.
- DANTO, Arthur. "The Artworld", The Journal of Philosophy, Vol. 61, No. 19, 1964: 571-584.
- DANTO, Arthur. "Beauty and Morality", in Bill Beckley and David Shapiro (eds.), Uncontrollable Beauty, New York: Allworth Press, 1998, pp. 25-39.
- DANTO, Arthur. "The Abuse of Beauty", Daedalus, Vol. 131, No. 4, Fall 2002: 35-56.
- DAVIS, Ben. "What Good is Political Art in Times Like This", Artinfo, 2 (2011), available at: <http://www.artinfo.com/news/story/37024/what-good-is-political-art-in-times-like-these/>.
- DAVIES, Stephen. "Aesthetic Judgments, Artworks, and Functional Beauty", The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 56, No. 223, 2006, pp. 224-241.
- DEMAITRE, Ann. "The Great Debate on Socialist Realism", The Modern Language Journal, Vol. 50, No. 5 (1966): 263-268.
- DE MAN, Paul. Aesthetic Ideology, Minneapolis/London: University of Minnesota Press, 1997.
- DICKIE, George. "The Myth of the Aesthetic Attitude", American Philosophical Quarterly, 1 (1964): 56-65.
- DICKIE, George. Art and the Aesthetic: an Institutional Analysis, Cornell University Press, 1974.
- DICKIE, George. The Art Circle, New York: Haven, 1984.
- DIANI and Bison, "Organizations, Coalitions and Movements", in Theory and Society, 3 (2004): 281-309.
- DUTTON, Denis . "The Experience of Art is Paradise Regained: Kant on Free and Dependent Beauty", The British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 34, No. 3 (1994).
- DZIEMIDOK, Bohdan. "Artistic Formalism: Its Achievements and Weaknesses", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 51, No. 2 (1993): 185-193.
- EAGLETON, Terry. The ideology of the Aesthetic, Oxford: Blackwell, 1990.
- EIDE, Marian. "The Politics of Form: A Response to Jeffrey T. Schnapp", South Central Review, Vol. 21, No. 1, (2004): 22-49.
- ELLIOT, Emory. "Cultural Diversity and the Problem of Aesthetics", in Emory Elliot, Louis Freitas Caton and Jeffrey Rhyne (eds.), Aesthetics in a Multicultural Age, New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- ELSTER, Jon. Le désintéressement. Traité critique de l'homme économique, (tome I), Paris: Seuil, 2009.

- FELSHIN, Nina. But is it Art? The Spirit of Art as Activism, Seattle: Bay Press, 1995.
- FREELAND, Cynthia. But Is It Art?: An Introduction to Art Theory, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- GADAMER, Hans Georg. Truth and Method, London and New York: Bloomsbury, 1989.
- GOLOMSTOCK, Igor. Totalitarian Art in the Soviet Union, the Third Reich, Fascist Italy and the People's Republic of China, London: Collins Harvill Press, 1991.
- GOODMAN, Nelson. Language of Art, Indianapolis: Indianapolis Press, 1976.
- GRIGORESCU, Ion. "A Version of Memory", IDEA arts + society, 25 January 2007, translated into English by Alex Moldovan, Cluj, 2006.
- GROYS, Boris. The Power of Art, Cambridge: MIT Press, 2008.
- HEGEL, G. W. F., Aesthetics: Lectures of Fine Art, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975.
- HEIN, Hilde. 'Refining Feminist Theory. Lessons from Aesthetics', in Hilde Hein and Carolyn Korsmeyer (eds.), "Aesthetics in Feminist Perspective", Hypatia Inc., 1993.
- HIGGINS, Kathleen. "Whatever Happened to Beauty? A Response to Danto", Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, 54 (1996): 281-284.
- KAGAN, Shelly. "Rethinking Intrinsic Value", The Journal of Ethics, Vol. 2, No.4 (1998): 277-297.
- KANT, Immanuel. The Critique of Judgment, trans. Werner S. Pluhar, Indianapolis: Hackett, 1987.
- KESTER, Grant. Conversation Pieces. Community and Communicability in Modern Art, Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- KIRSCHNER, Anja and David Panos, Interview with Frieze editors, "Art and politics-A Survey (part2)", in Frieze, 12 (2012).
- KRAMER, Hilton. 'Art: Judy Chicago's Dinner Party Comes to Brooklyn Museum', The New York Times, 17 October 1980.
- KREITMAN, Norman. "Varieties of Aesthetic Disinterestedness", in Contemporary Aesthetics, 6 (2006). Available from: <http://www.contempaesthetics.org/newvolume/pages/article.php?articleID=390>.
- KUSPIT, Donald. "Activist Art and the Moral Imperative", New Art Examiner, January 1991.
- LIPPARD, Lucy. "Trojan Horses: Activist Art and Power", in Sally Everett (ed.), Art Theory and Criticism, Sally McFarland Pub., Jefferson NC, 1983.
- LORAND, Ruth. "In Defence of Beauty", Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism (2007), available at: http://www.aesthetics-online.org/articles/index.php?articles_id=34.
- MALLABAND, Philip. "Understanding Kant's Distinction between Free and Dependent Beauty", The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 52, Issue 206 (2002): 66-81.
- MARCUSE, Herbert. The Aesthetic Dimension, Beacon Press, 1979.

- MARTINEIELLO, Marco and Jean-Michel Lafleur, "Ethnic Minorities' Cultural and Artistic Practices as Forms of Political Expression: A Review of the Literature and a Theoretical Discussion on Music", Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, Vol. 34, No. 8 (2008): 1191-1217.
- MASLOW, Vera. "Lukacs' Man-Centered Aesthetics", Philosophy and Phenomenological Research, Vol. 27, No.4 (1967): 542-552.
- MATTICK, Paul. "Aesthetics and Anti-Aesthetics in the Visual Arts", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Spring (1993): 253-259.
- MCGREGOR, Robert. "Art and the Aesthetic" in The Journal of Aesthetics and art Criticism, Vol. 32, No. 4 (1974): 549-559.
- MCIVER Lopes's, Dominic. "The Myth of (Non-Aesthetic) Artistic Value", Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 61, Issue 244 (2011): 518-536.
- MORTENSEN, Preben. "Shaftesbury and the Morality of Art Appreciation" in Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 55, No. 4 (1994), pp. 631-650.
- MOUFFE, Chantal. On The Political, London-New York: Routledge, 2005.
- MOUFFE, Chantal, Rosalyn Deutsche, Branden W. Joseph, Thomas Keenan. "Every Form of Art Has a Political Dimension", Grey Room, No. 2, MIT Press, 2001.
- MOUFFE, Chantal. "Artistic Activism and Agonistic Spaces", Art and Research, 1, No. 2 (2007). available at: <http://www.artandresearch.org.uk/v1n2/mouffe.html>.
- MUELDER Eaton, Marcia. Merit, Aesthetic and Ethical, New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- MUELDER Eaton, Marcia. "Kantian and Contextual Beauty", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Blackwell Publishing, Vol. 57, No. 1, (1999).
- MULLIN, Amy. "Feminist Art and the Political Imagination", Hypatia, Vol. 18, No. 4 (2003): 189-213.
- NATO, Thomson. Living as Form: Socially Engaged Art from 1991-2011, New York: Creative Time, 2012.
- NEHAMAS, Alexander . "The Return of the Beautiful: Morality, Pleasure, and the Value of Uncertainty", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 58, No. 4 (2000): 393-403.
- OSBORNE, Harold. Aesthetics and Art Theory. An Historical Introduction, New York: Longmans, 1968.
- PARSONS, Glenn. "Moderate Formalism as a Theory of the Aesthetic", Journal of Aesthetic Education, Vol. 38, No.3 (2004): 1-17.
- PARSONS, Glen and Allan Carlson. Functional Beauty, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2008.
- PASSMORE, J. A. "The Dreariness of Aesthetics", in W. Elton (ed.), Aesthetics and Language, Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1954.

- PRALL, David. Aesthetic Judgment, New York: Crowell, 1967.
- RADEK, Karl. "Contemporary World Literature and the Tasks of Proletarian Art", in Problems of Soviet Literature, 35 (1948).
- RANCIÈRE, Jacques. Le spectateur émancipé. Paris: Le Fabrique, 2008.
- RANCIÈRE, Jacques. Disensus: On Politics and Aesthetics, London & New York: Continuum, 2010.
- RAUNIG, Gerald. "Art and Revolution: Transversal Activism the Long Twentieth Century", Semiotex(e), 2007 (originally published in Austria by Turia + Kant, 2005).
- RAUNIG, Gerald with Gene Ray (eds.), Art and Contemporary Critical Practice: Reinventing Institutional Critique, MayFly Books, 2009.
- RAUNIG, Gerald. "Creative Industries as Mass Deception", in Gerald Raunig, Gene Ray and Ulf Wuggenig (eds.), Critique of Creativity, Precarity, Subjectivity and Resistance in the Creative Industries, MayFly Books, 2011.
- REBER, Rolf, Norbert Schwarz and Piotr Winkelman, "Processing Fluency and Aesthetic Pleasure: Is Beauty in the Perceiver's Processing Experience?" in Personality and Social Psychology Review, Vol. 8, No.4 (2004): 364-382.
- ROSE, T. Black Noise. Rap Music and Black Culture in Contemporary America, Middletown: Wesleyan University Press, 1994.
- ROSLER, Martha. "Take the Money and Run? Can Political and Socio-Critical Art 'Survive'?", E-flux, 2011, available at: <http://www.e-flux.com/journal/take-the-money-and-run-can-political-and-socio-critical-art>.
- ROSS, Toni. "Departures from postmodern doctrine in Jacques Ranciere's account of the politics of artistic modernity", Transformations, No. 19 (2011), available at: http://www.transformationsjournal.org/journal/issue_19/article_06.shtml.
- RUBINSTEIN, Annette. "Disinterestedness as Ideal and as Technique", The Journal of Philosophy, Vol. 28, No. 17 (1931) p. 462.
- SCHELLEKENS, Elisabeth. "The Aesthetic Values of Ideas", in Peter Goldie and Elisabeth Schellekens (eds.), Philosophy and Conceptual Art, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- SEEL, Martin. Aesthetics of Appearing, Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2005.
- SHAW, Angharad. "Can Aesthetic Theories of Art Be Rescued From the Problem of Avant-Garde and Other Non-Perceptual Artworks?", Postgraduate Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 4, No. 1 (2007). Available from: <http://www.british-aesthetics.org/uploads/Microsoft%20Word%20-%20Non-perceptual%20aesthetic%20properties%20final.pdf>.
- SHELLY, James. "The Problem of Non-Perceptual Art" in British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 43, No. 4 (2003): 363-378.
- SHOLETTE, Gregory. Dark Matter: Art and Politics in the Age of Enterprise Culture, London: Pluto Press, 2011.

- SHOLETTE, Gregory. "Twelve notes on collectivism and dark matter", Artlies, available at: <http://www.artlies.org/article.php?id=1541&issue=56&s=0>.
- SMITH, James. Terry Eagleton, Cambridge: Polity Press, 2008.
- SOLSO, Robert. Cognition and the Visual Arts, Cambridge, Massachusetts and London: MIT Press, 1994.
- STEINER, Barbara. "No Velvet Glove Criticism: Towards a Political Effectiveness of Art", in: Fair Observer, July 2012. Available from: <http://www.fairobserver.com:8080/article/no-velvet-glove-criticism-towards-political-effectiveness-art?page=2>.
- STIMSON, Blake and Gregory Sholette (eds.). Collectivism after Modernism: The Art of Social Imagination after 1945, Minneapolis, London: University of Minnesota Press, 2004.
- STILES, Kristine. "Language and Concepts", in Kristine Stiles and Peter Selz (eds.), Theory and Documents of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1996.
- STOLNITZ, Jerome. "On the Origins of Aesthetic Disinterestedness", in George Dickie and Richard J. Sclafani (eds.), Aesthetics: A Critical Anthology, New York: St Martin's Press, 1977.
- STOLNITZ, Jerome. Art in the Social Order: The Making of the Modern Concept of Art, State University of New York, 2003.
- TAYLOR, Roger. Art, an Enemy of the People, Hassocks, Sussex: Harvester, 1978.
- CHRISTY Mag Uidhir and P. D. Magnus, "Art Concept Pluralism", Metaphilosophy, Vol. 42, No. 1-2, 2011, pp. 83-97.
- VANDEN BERG, Hubert. "On the Historiographic Distinction between Historical and Neo-Avant-Garde", in Dietrich Scheunemann (ed.), Avant-Garde / Neo-Avant-Garde, Amsterdam - New York: Rodopi Editions, 2005.
- VAN DER GUCHT, Daniel. "Pour en finir avec la mythologie de l'artiste politique: de l'engagement a la responsabilite" in Eric Van Essche (ed.), Les Formes Contemporaines d'Art Engage, Bruxelles: Collection Essais, 2007.
- VOGEL, Sabine. "Political Patterns-Changing Ornament", in Nafas Art Magazine, 7 (2011), available at: http://universes-in-universe.org/eng/nafas/articles/2011/political_patterns.
- WALTON, Kendall. "Aesthetics - What? Why? And Wherefore?", Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 65, No. 2 (2007): 147-162.
- WIEAND, Jeffrey. "Can There Be an Institutional Theory of Art?", The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Vol. 39, No. 4 (Summer, 1981), pp. 409-417.
- ZANGWILL, Nick. "In Defense of Extreme Formalism about Inorganic Nature", British Journal of Aesthetics, Vol. 45, No. 2, (2005).

ZANGWILL, Nick. 'The Concept of the Aesthetic', European Journal of Philosophy, Vol. 6, No. 1 (1998): 78-93, also available at:
<https://www.dur.ac.uk/nick.zangwill/PDFs/ConceptAesthetic.pdf>.

ZANGWILL, Nick. "Against the Sociology of the Aesthetic", in Cultural Values, Vol. 6, No. 4 (2002): 443-452.

ZANGWILL, Nick. "Feasible Aesthetic Formalism", Nous, Vol. 33, No. 4 (1999): 610-629.

ZANGWILL, Nick. "Beauty", in Jerrold Levinson (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of Aesthetics, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.

ZEGLIN Brand, Peggy. "Disinterestedness and Political Art", in Paradoxa, No. 8, November, 1998.